"Yes, I have a boyfriend, and yes, we're sexually active," she said. "It's not so much that I don't want little copies of me running around - it's to regulate my cycle."

CHILDREN

One of the hardest aspect for women with PCOS is having children, Harvey said. It is not impossible to conceive, but it is difficult because the egg does not fully develop inside a woman with PCOS. Women with PCOS receive shots that can help them conceive.

However, Harvey said because of the number of children as well as college students in her life, she is not one of those who wants children.

"I'm not in such a struggle to have children, but there are women who go through their lives trying to have children," she said. "They either miscarry or can't ovulate."

Harvey said she encourages people who might have PCOS and want children to talk to their doctors as soon as possible.

"If you have an intention of having children and you have PCOS, then you'll have a struggle with it," she said.

STAYING FIT

Harvey said one of the hardest things to do for someone with her condition is staying in shape. She used to be about 50 pounds lighter.

"I enjoyed it," she said. "I had smaller clothes and a lot more dates."

But, because of her fibromyalgia, she has put the weight back on. She said she has pain because of the condition.

"It's hard to exercise," she said. "I'm actually getting ready to start with a new rheumatologist. I'm going to go, 'Look, you've got to help me with some pain control so I can get back on the treadmills and back on the bikes and lose the weight."

However, some women with PCOS can be lean. There are many different forms of PCOS that affect women with different body types.

REACHING OUT

After being diagnosed with PCOS, Harvey has combined her degree in mass communications and her knowledge about PCOS to start an e-zine, called PCOS Today, at www.pcostodaymagazine.com. She said by talking about PCOS - she is not trying to make people feel sorry for her - she wants other women to know they are not alone.

"I've always had a huge passion for public awareness and public communication," she said. "I thought, 'Why am I not using this talent I've developed to convey this out there?'"

She said she does not want another woman to be in her position of depression and denial. She is even willing to talk to women in confidence about the condition.

If a student thinks they might have PCOS, Harvey said they should go to a clinic, like Lafene Health Center. She said they should know what is going on with their body.

"I can't imagine going through life and not understand what's going on inside your body," she said. "The whole idea is that ignorance is not bliss, because it can lead to so many other problems. When you know what's going on, you're physically and mentally more in tune."

If a student is diagnosed with PCOS, Harvey said she would talk to them about her experience.

"It's an embarrassing condition to deal with," she said. "About five to 10 percent of all child-bearing women around the United States are dealing with it."

at other schools and develop stronger leadership skills, Daniels said.

"It's a way for chapters to share ideas and to learn about what other chapters are doing," she said. "Also, the students hone leadership skills to take back to their chapters that help them be a better Blue Key chapter."

K-State's current Blue Key president, Mary Kate Ludwig, senior in history, said she was excited to showcase the organization's friendly relationships within the group and on campus.

"We get to showcase our energy for Blue Key by serving as hosts," she said. "(Other chapters) get to be on campus and watch us interact with each other and our chapter advisers and leaders, which is really the strength of our chapter. We are a chapter of very strong relations. By them watching our interactions, we get to show them something that is sort of a trademark of our chapter."

At a dinner Friday in the K-State Student Union, each chapter in attendance made a short presentation about the strengths of its chapter and some of its activities during the year. Presentations and lectures were given Saturday at the Holiday Inn, including a keynote address by former football coach Bill Snyder. The day concluded with bowling in the Union and volleyball and basketball games in the Peters Recreation Complex.

"What we do in this convention is helping us recognize that the work we do as leaders today is really going to propel us into the future," Ludwig said. "It helps us keep in mind the legacy we're going to have and leave on our campuses."

woman with foresight, integrity, has an interest in the people and has experience with people all over the world. I'm very pleased."

Aaron Apel, Young Democrats president, also said he was pleased with Clinton's announcement.

"As a woman, she'll bring a much-needed different set of views to the race," Apel, senior in philosophy, said. "Her perspective will be one of her most valuable assets she can bring. In a country of 300 million people, having diversity in the two-party system is in America's best interest."

Along with Clinton, the candidates for the 2008 Democratic nomination includes 2004 vice-presidential nominee John Edwards and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

The Democratic National Committee issued a statement calling Brownback "a stubborn ideologue who places his own political agenda over the needs of the American people."

While Brownback touched on a wide variety of issues, he laced his speech with the themes that have made him a leader of GOP conservatives and a strong spokesman in Congress for socially conservative Christians.

"He has a consistency that others don't seem to have," said Hollie Cook, a 30-year-old mother of three from Walkerton, Ind., who was traveling with her family to Texas and stopped for Saturday's event.

A fierce foe of abortion, Brownback planned to return to Washington to participate in an anti-abortion rally Monday marking the 34th anniversary of the Supreme Court decision that established a nationwide right to the procedure.

Also in his announcement, Brownback said the country needs to support the traditional definition of marriage as a union of a man and a woman and said most Americans believe in "a culture of life."

He pledged never to sign a tax increase if elected president and proposed scrapping the current income tax law, saying it "should be taken behind the barn and killed with a dull ax."

Brownback faces as many as 10 potential GOP hopefuls, including Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani - all with the fundraising skills and experienced campaign staff for the long haul.

While he is on solid footing on social issues, Brownback has broken with some Republicans on the Iraq war and immigration.

He opposes President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq, saying, "Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution." Brownback also favors an eventual path to citizenship for some of the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants.

Jenna Elfman pregnant with first child

LOS ANGELES (AP) - Jenna Elfman, who starred in TV's "Dharma & Greg," is expecting her first child.

Elfman and her husband, actor Bodhi Elfman, have been married for 16 years and are "elated about the impending birth," her publicist, Jenni Weinman, said in a statement Friday.

"Jenna looks and feels amazing. She is certain to be one hot mama!" Weinman said.

Elfman, 35, played free-spirited Dharma Finklestein Montgomery in the odd-couple comedy, which ran from 1997-2002 on ABC.

Elfman's screen credits include 2005's "Touched" and 2000's "Keeping the Faith."

Irwin follows in father's footsteps

WASHINGTON (AP) - Bindi Irwin is ready to continue her famous father's work spreading the wonder of wildlife.

"I'm going to become a wildlife warrior just like he was," 8-year-old Bindi, daughter of the late Steve Irwin, told an audience Friday at Washington's National Press Club.

About five months after Steve Irwin was killed by a stingray, Bindi and her mother, Terri, are touring the United States to promote Bindi's upcoming TV series.

Asked Friday if the attention was too much too soon, Terri said that Bindi told her after Steve's death that she wanted to get back to filming wildlife shows as soon as possible.

"Grief is a road that each individual travels in their own way," Terri said, her daughter by her side. "For us to get right back up and be able to say that Steve's work counted for something" has been a help to the Irwin family and others.

As proof of her commitment to her father's work, Bindi cheerfully described some of the world's most ferocious animals as "so sweet and gentle," praising crocodiles as "such great mothers" and snakes as "just gorgeous."

Bindi was asked how she compared snakes and reporters: "I really think I like poisonous snakes," she answered, grinning for the dozens of assembled cameras and journalists.

SOAP

Students produce their own soap operas for online contest

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Soap opera fans of the collegiate community now have the chance to vote for episodes produced and directed by students from nine colleges across the country.

Students can log on to Soapnet.com and vote for the best of the 10 semi-finalist videos by students from New York University, University of Southern Maine, Loyola Marymount University, Pace University, University of Michigan-Ann Arbor, Academy of Art University-San Francisco, North Carolina School for the Arts, Columbia University and Southern Methodist University.

Erin Weir, director of promotions for Soapnet, said the organization had heard of students on campus creating their own content in the past.

"This the generation of YouTube," she said. "We wanted to give a voice to the students and give them an open forum." The first round of episodes has already been created. Voting began on Jan. 15 and continues until Friday.

The top five finalists will move on and be given a new soap scenario and will create a new five-minute vignette with a 20-second promotion video. Soapnet will judge these internally.

Episodes will be judged on three different components — originality, "soapiness" and overall quality, Weir said.

The winner will then travel to Los Angeles and pitch ideas for a soap episode with a $20,000 budget for the production. After the pitch meeting, Weir said the possibilities could go anywhere.

"We received entries from all over the country," she said. "It was so exciting to see the talent that was out there."

Even students at K-State who don't watch or aren't interested in soap operas should visit the Web site, Weir said, noting that several popular TV shows have a little bit of "soap" in them.

"Very popular shows have the qualities of a soap, such as 'Beverly Hills: 90210' or 'Grey's Anatomy,'" she said.

She said Soapnet.com has many other contests available, such as Fantasy Soap Week, which is a fantasy football-esque contest.

"The similarities between sports and soaps are more than you would think," she said.

Natalie Zych, senior in dietetics, said she isn't an avid soap watcher, but she watches "Grey's Anatomy" every Thursday night.

"I think it would be neat to be able to watch the videos online," she said.

Zych said she just recently visited the Web site but has not voted yet.

"I need a little bit more time to really sit down and watch them all, but the stuff that I have seen has looked pretty cool," she said.

She said "Grey's Anatomy" does have some soap qualities, and the drama and characters are why she likes it.

"It would have been great to see a K-State student in the mix, but students should jump on the site and take a look," she said.

For more information or to vote, visit www.soapnet.com.

Year's lesser-known albums offer variety of sounds

Girl Talk, "Night Ripper"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

The mash-up is a newly burgeoning genre that involves the combination of disparate song fragments to create completely new and imaginative compositions.

The genre has yet to gain much critical acclaim because anyone with the right computer software can create these often-amateurish arrangements.

However, Gregg Gillis' (aka Girl Talk) "Night Ripper" has presented the perfect argument for the mash-up as a legitimate musical genre.

Want to hear Elton John's "Tiny Dancer" backing rhymes from Notorious B.I.G. or 2 Live Crew combined with Paul McCartney?

Now you can with this brilliant party album that not only will restore memories of your favorite songs but also, through the album's inventive combinations, create new ones from old songs that sound fresh and vibrant. Plus, it'll make you want to dance.

The Thermals, "The Body, The Blood, The Machine"

Scrubbing away most of its brutal, lo-fi sound for a cleaner, more measured approach to song arrangements, these Portland, Ore., natives have managed to create a much more immediate album than previous efforts by showing no mercy with the subjects of war, God and political duplicity.

Opening with the dystopian imagery of "Here's Your Future," the album barrels through 10 unblinking tracks that pull no punches against its targets and detonate like bombs in listeners' eardrums.

Herbert, "Scale"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

After a few unfocused albums following 2001's brilliant "Bodily Functions," Matthew Herbert returns to form riding the momentum created by recent collaborations with such chanteuses as Bjork and Roisin Murphy.

Herbert's 2006 release, "Scale," samples more than 700 sounds, including the sound of a coffin opening, soda cans, hot air balloons and even a person vomiting.

Herbert weaves these sounds into a tapestry of elegant house music.

The samples are combined with Herbert's trademark orchestrations to create an extremely ambitious yet entirely listenable and entirely danceable album full of beautiful melodies and brilliant multi-part harmonies.

THIS WEEK... A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TODAY 1973: Supreme Court legalizes abortion

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Roe v. Wade that women can terminate a pregnancy during the first two trimesters. The controversial ruling, reversing a century of legislation in the United States, came from women wanting control of their reproductive processes.

The debate grew in the 1960s, and both pro-choice and pro-life organizations strengthened membership and political influence.

TUESDAY 1957: Wham-O produces first Frisbees

Machines at the Wham-O toy company roll out the first batch of their aerodynamic plastic discs — now known to millions of fans all over the world as Frisbees. Today, at least 60 manufacturers produce Frisbees. The official Frisbee is owned by Mattel Toy Manufacturers, who bought the toy from Wham-O in 1994.

WEDNESDAY 1935: First canned beer sold

In partnership with the American Can Company, the Gottfried Krueger Brewing Company delivered 2,000 cans of Krueger's Finest Beer and Krueger's Cream Ale to faithful Krueger drinkers in Richmond, Virginia. Ninety-one percent of the drinkers approved of the canned beer, driving Krueger to give the green light to further production. By the end of 1935, over 200 million cans had been produced and sold.

THURSDAY 1905: World's largest diamond found

At the Premier Mine in Pretoria, South Africa, a 3,106-carat diamond was discovered during a routine inspection by the mine's superintendent. Weighing 1.33 pounds, it was the largest diamond ever found. It was later cut into nine large stones and about 100 smaller ones, valued at millions of dollars.

Frederick Wells, the superintendent, was 18 feet below the surface when he spotted a flash of light embedded in the wall above him. He then presented it to Sir Thomas Cullinan, who owned the mine and the diamond was later christened the "Cullinan."

FRIDAY 1838: First prohibition law passed

The first Prohibition law in the history of the United States passed in Tennessee, making it a misdemeanor to sell alcoholic beverages in taverns and stores. The bill stated that all persons convicted of retailing "spirituous liquors" would be fined at the "discretion of the court" and that the fines would be used in support of public schools.

In 1933, the 21st Amendment to the Constitution was passed and ratified, repealing Prohibition.

Lawmakers to consider nuke plant

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, Kan. — Although no one currently is planning to build a nuclear plant in Kansas, state lawmakers will consider making that possibility more attractive as part of a package of energy-related issues.

The bill, which is scheduled for a public hearing Tuesday, would provide incentives for building a nuclear power plant in the state.

The bill "is a recognition that as we look at energy independence for the state, nuclear, renewable energy and coal all have a place," said State Rep. Tom Sloan, R-Lawrence, a member of the House Energy and Utilities Committee.

The legislation would exempt any new nuclear generation or new construction at the Wolf Creek nuclear plant near Burlington from property taxes.

Sloan said the proposed bill simply would lay the groundwork for expanding nuclear power, if it ever becomes economically and politically feasible.

The owners of Wolf Creek are not planning to build any additional capacity at the plant, which has been operating since 1985.

Wanted man arrested on 7 warrants

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wade Ferris Harper was arrested on seven warrants Friday, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department said. Ferris was on the RCPD's most wanted list.

Four of the warrants were for failure to appear, and three were for probation violation, Quintanar said.

The probation charges relate to the original charges of criminal use of a financial card, theft.

The failure to appear charges stemmed from the original charges of criminal use of a financial card, and theft by a person with two or more theft charges.

Total bond was set at $12,598.

Title IX leaves students unsatisfied in pursuit of athletic equality, funding

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Liz Adams plays soccer for K-State, but it's club, not intercollegiate, soccer.

Adams says she was denied the benefits of playing varsity women's soccer because of the constraints of Title IX legislation.

"In trying to equalize men and women participants in sports, we end up having fewer sports," said Adams, senior in Spanish and international studies, "and some of the ones we do have are just because they require large numbers of people, not because kids grow up loving to play and want to continue in college."

Adams joined K-State's club soccer team because her passion for the game did make her want to continue playing as a college student.

"I love soccer, and it has been such a big part of my life for so long that I couldn't give it up," she said.

Adams looked into transferring to another university to play intercollegiate soccer, but decided to stay at K-State, even though she would have to play at the club level. University choices in how to comply with Title IX, coupled with a tight budget, led to the club-only status of women's soccer.

"I think it's absurd that K-State doesn't have a varsity team," she said. "We're the only school in the Big 12 without a women's varsity team, and soccer is a pretty big sport in the Midwest."

"It's fast becoming more and more popular, and K-State should catch up with the times."

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY

In its most common implementation, Title IX has intended to enforce equality in men's and women's sports at the collegiate level since its passage in 1972. It is an equality that must be met and maintained by institutions of higher education as well as vocational and professional institutions.

This mandated equality between men's and women's athletics can be established in one of three ways, said Dru Hancock, associate commissioner of the Big 12 Conference. First, an institution complies with Title IX if it can prove its array of athletic teams meets the interest level of its students.

Second, it can give scholarships in equal proportion to the percentage of each gender represented by the student body. Third, it can meet proportionality in participants, equipment, recruiting dollars and other categories outlined by the NCAA.

K-State is Title IX-compliant, as it meets the third test, proportionality, said Laura Tietjen, senior woman administrator for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. There are 235 male athletes in seven sports and 228 female athletes in nine sports, according to K-State's 2006 Equity in Athletics and Disclosure form.

However, it wasn't always that way.

When the K-State women's basketball team was established in 1968

Title IX Myths

Myth: Title IX is only about athletics.

Fact: Most people who know about Title IX think it only applies to sports, but Title IX applies to every aspect of federally funded education programs. In fact, athletics is only one of 10 major areas addressed by the law.

Myth: Football and men's basketball finance other athletics programs in colleges.

Fact: Most football and men's basketball teams spend much more money than they bring in. A 1999 study shows that 58% of Division I-A and I-AA football programs don't generate enough revenue to pay for themselves, much less any other sports. These programs reported annual deficits averaging $1 million and $630,000 respectively.

Myth: Title IX has gone too far in athletics.

Fact: The playing field is far from level for female athletes, despite Title IX's considerable successes. Women's athletics programs still lag behind men's programs. While 53% of the students at Division I schools are women, female athletes in Division I receive only:

- 41% of the opportunities to play intercollegiate sports,
- 43% of the total athletic scholarship dollars,
- 36% of the athletic operating budgets, and
- 32% of the dollars spent to recruit new athletes.

Spending on men's sports continues to increase and dominate spending on women's sports: In Division I, in 2000, for every dollar being spent on women's sports, almost two dollars are being spent on men's sports.

Of the $3.57 million average increase in expenditures for men's Division I-A sports programs from 1996-2000, 68% of this increase, or $2,463,000, went to football. This amount exceeds the entire operating budget for all women's sports in 2000 by over $1,693,600.

— before Title IX — under the leadership of coach Judy Akers, the women received significantly fewer resources than the men's team.

Akers recalled a few of the discrepancies to the Topeka Capital-Journal in 2002, saying her team was given four practice balls and was allowed to practice in the gym only at off times, like 5 a.m.

After Title IX was passed during Akers' 1968-79 tenure as head coach, men's teams still were favored with more funding and resources. Akers filed a complaint, eventually resigning her position over the issue.

In stark contrast to Akers' years at K-State, the women's basketball pro-

City commissioners to examine concealed weapons ban

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission will consider banning concealed weapons from several City properties at its meeting Tuesday night.

The Kansas Legislature adopted the "Kansas Personal and Family Protection Act" last year, which, starting January 1, made licenses to carry concealed weapons available to citizens who meet certain requirements.

The act also included more than 20 classifications of places, like city halls, churches and colleges, where concealed weapons remain illegal. This provision made such city property illegal to concealed carry, but not all.

Another provision in the act lets people ban concealed carry on their own property by putting up signs that meet certain size and content requirements.

City Attorney William Frost said the resolution the commission will consider tonight will make it illegal to bring concealed weapons to more city properties. It would have the city put signs up at all city pools, City Hall and other property.

Frost said the legislature's act did not provide for signs to mark the places it made illegal to bearers of concealed weapons. He said this resolution will allow the city to put signs wherever the weapons are prohibited.

"I think that the list proposed by the city manager is a reasonable one," Mayor Bruce Snead said. "These are places that have public gatherings and parks so I think that this is a prudent choice"

The Commission also will consider expanding the Transportation Development District (TDD) in the north downtown redevelopment, which would expand the area where a half-cent sales tax is collected to pay for public projects.

The city established the original TDD at the request of Dial Realty, the company behind the redevelopment project. Funds from the taxes collected in the TDD will be used to pay off the bonds that pay for public work, like street construction, in the redevelopment area.

The current TDD includes Best Buy and a few lots of land still being developed and covers almost six acres.

The expanded TDD would include almost all land inside Tuttle Creek Boulevard, Bluemont Avenue, 4th Street and Leavenworth Street and cover almost 22 acres.

There are some gaps inside those boundaries, though. Assistant City Manager Jason Hilgers said the gaps are land Dial does not own yet. He said it is likely Dial will request a new TDD once it acquires them.

Transplant saves student with MDS

By Dustin Sanborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It started with a nagging foot infection that wouldn't go away.

After a few weeks of pain, Rachael Leisy, sophomore in elementary education, underwent tests before returning to Manhattan last semester.

Soon after she arrived, she got a call from Kansas City's Saint Luke's Hospital saying it was urgent that she come in for further tests.

Two days later, doctors diagnosed her with Myelodysplastic Syndrome.

MDS is a group of unusual blood diseases that affect the bone marrow, which is essential for producing new blood cells.

When someone has MDS, the bone marrow begins making defective blood cells.

These blood cells start to outnumber the healthy cells and cause the blood to cease carrying oxygen, clot, or protect the body from other disease, according to www.mds-foundation.org.

"I found the news shocking," Leisy said. "It was a blessing to get the infection though, because I wouldn't have otherwise known that I had MDS."

Leisy needed new bone marrow, so doctors conducted a worldwide search for bone marrow donors and found four potential matches.

"It was very exciting news to find out that there were matches out there," Leisy said. "We went with the first person on the list who was a 9-of-10 match, because the MDS was rapidly moving along and we could not wait for a perfect 10-of-10 match."

Preparing for the transplant required an eight-day regimen of intensive chemotherapy to kill the affected cells so the transplant would have a chance to be successful.

"It saved my life that this donor stepped up to be my donor, and for that, I will be eternally grateful," Leisy said.

When she returned home from the hospital, Leisy's house had to be completely sterilized because her weakened immune system put her at a greater risk for infection.

"Little things mean so much to me," Leisy said. "Outings, for me, required me to wear a surgical mask and involved going to and from a clinic twice a week to check my blood counts."

It has been more than 100 days since her transplant, and Leisy said she now is MDS-free.

"It was really exciting news," said Leisy. "Mom and I had tears of joy at the hospital."

"I have really grown in my faith through this experience, and I'm grateful for each day that I'm alive."

Leisy said she wants to start a bone marrow drive sometime this semester at K-State and is working with her transplant coordinator and Heart of America to cover the cost of bone marrow registry testing.

"When you sign up to become a bone marrow donor, you sign up to save someone else's life," she said.

Student takes home award for best paper

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the third year in row, a student from the Department of Hotel, Restaurant, Institutional Management and Dietetics received an award for the best paper at the Graduate Education and Graduate Student Research Conference in Hospitality and Tourism.

Amelia Estepa Asperin, a doctoral candidate in human ecology-institution management, received one of two awards for best paper at the conference this year.

"The process is rigorous and it certainly is an honor to be chosen by a group of professors and researchers who I aspire to emulate," Asperin said. "It is a great affirmation that my research and all the work I've put into it is recognized."

The conference at the University of Houston attracts some of the premier hospitality programs in the country, said Deb Canter, head of the hotel and restaurant management department.

"Within the world of hospitality management, this is kind of like going to the World Series," Canter said.

Canter said the hospitality department at K-State is significantly smaller than many other colleges but is growing in enrollment and reputation.

The conference allows students to get experience and recognition from potential employers, Asperin said.

"I will be graduating soon, and getting the award has opened doors for me," she said. "I met several professors at the conference and being recognized definitely made the networking easier."

Although the award recognizes one person, several other students and professors contributed to the award.

Carol Shanklin, associate dean of the Graduate School, and Ki-Joon Back, a former K-State faculty member now at the University of Houston, co-authored the paper along with Asperin.

"(The award) is a great affirmation that my research and all the work I've put into it is recognized," Asperin said. "It is also the best way that I could thank my mentors and make them proud."

TO THE POINT Title IX needs to be re-evaluated

The idea of establishing guidelines to regulate equality between men's and women's intercollegiate athletics was a necessity in 1972, but as time has passed, the standards set by Title IX have become not only outdated, but counterproductive.

The Title IX numbers game of quotas and proportionality negatively affects not only male athletes, but any participants in smaller, less mainstream sports.

The K-State women's club softball team, for example, has been a national competitor for years. A team of that caliber deserves varsity status, even though it doesn't require a large roster of players to fill scholarship slots.

Under Title IX and the budget constraints of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, however, it's easier simply to add sports with large rosters to achieve the necessary balance.

Balance and fairness don't seem to go hand in hand, however, when 69 members of K-State equestrian team, which was created to offset football, are on some sort of scholarship. Compare that to the Wildcat baseball squad, which is allotted 11.7 scholarships for a roster of 34.

The problem with a quota system is that it's about numbers, not interest level – or more importantly, talent.

Seeing as almost 35 years have passed since Title IX was put into effect, it's high time it was adjusted so as to affect positive changes in the world of intercollegiate athletics. The original intent was good, but it doesn't mean the system shouldn't adapt to reflect the changes society has undergone since its establishment.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Americans should not be fooled by former First Lady's new image

Snakes shed their skin once a year. But even after a change, a snake is still a snake.

James Madison described in "Federalist Paper #49," experimentation in government can be good for the Union. America is ready for a woman to be President, but we should at least make integrity a qualification.

Hillary "stand by your man" Clinton decided to develop a presidential exploratory committee for the 2008 election. Her Internet video announcement comes on the coattails of Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who made the same announcement last week.

There are many sides to Sen. Clinton, D-N.Y., and the American public needs to know which image she is going to portray.

Hillary's name and image have changed more times than Sean "Puff, Puffy, P. Diddy, etc." Combs'.

When playing the feminist card, she uses Rodham Clinton. If she has aspirations to move up in the political scene, she uses just her husband's name.

Why, with all the "I am woman hear me roar" rhetoric, does she still need Bill's name to get her a job?

Sen. Clinton portrays a new image of openness and interest in the well-being of someone other than herself.

By manipulating her image, Sen. Clinton takes advantage of her constituents by claiming she grew up in a middle-class family. How quickly she forgets her father was an executive in the textiles industry outside of Chicago or her attendance at Yale Law School.

The American public tends to be very supportive of candidates from humble beginnings. To see someone make it delivers resurgence in the concept of the American dream.

Feeding off the American dream, Hillary states in her video, "If you work hard and play by the rules, you can build a good life for yourself and your family."

The rules Hillary speaks of are the pride of hard-working Americans. Unfortunately, those same rules have been negated by the Clintons when they wished to make money.

According to a 1994 Washington Post article titled "Records Show Wider Role for Hillary Clinton."

Whitewater Papers Detail Involvement," the contracts used by the real estate firm were made illegal in many states due to their exploitation of the poor and undereducated.

During a sworn testimony, former personal accountant Gaines Norton said he told Bill and Hillary their actions probably were illegal.

The contracts were designed to strip property away from a buyer if one payment was missed.

Once the property was seized the buyer was not given a chance to regain any money paid. Land was then resold to the next sucker with the same contract form.

Financial investments tend to require money to be put into a program; however, the Clintons could have made well over $100,000 without paying a dime.

Even though they were never formally tried for these actions, many states have deemed the contracts used in the Whitewater real estate deal to be illegal.

The Gadsden Flag displays a Rattlesnake with the words "Don't Tread On Me." A snake is still a snake no matter how many times it sheds its skin, or in Hillary's case, creates a new image. The snake is running for the White House, and is ready to constrict around the throats of the American public.

Despite lack of political experience, Obama the best option in 2008

If people said in 2004 that a 45-year-old black man would lead the field of presidential contenders come next election, anyone with an ounce of common sense and political knowledge would have called them crazy.

But that prediction seems to have come true. When Illinois Democrat Barack Obama stole the show at the Democratic National Convention that year, he showed us why he would be successful – because he is so good at telling a story.

Politicians long have recognized the power of narrative. For example, autobiographies have become a staple of any serious presidential campaign.

George Bush told us about "A Charge to Keep" in 2000, while John Kerry touted "A Call to Service" in 2004, and John Edwards toured the nation on his "Two Americas" storyline, one he's repeated during his current bid for the White House.

Errol Morris especially knows the power of using a story to humanize a politician. His best known work is probably "The Fog of War," a political film narrated entirely by Robert McNamara, Secretary of Defense during much of the Vietnam War. Vilified because of his ties to that conflict, McNamara had a lot to answer for.

While the story McNamara told of his life and career wasn't always satisfying, it did provide glimpses into his worldviews and the regrets he harbors about his younger years. Morris let the footage speak for itself, and it does so in a more truthful, compassionate and condemning manner than any alternative arrangement.

The same approach almost helped former vice president Al Gore. Before the 2000 election, music video and film director Spike Jonze was given the opportunity to film Gore as he lounged around his house in Carthage, Tennessee. Away from the campaign trail, Gore shed his Candidate-o-tron 5000 appearance and became much more approachable.

The video originally was planned to air at the Democratic National Convention, and Jonze maintains that it would have swung the election.

What separates Obama from Gore and others is that his charm is always on. He's been able to tell good stories since 1995, when he penned the memoir "Dreams of my Father."

His speeches have been uniformly excellent, and showcase both his positions and his reasoning behind them. In an age where public relations firms decide between "death tax" and "estate tax" or "liberal" and "progressive," Obama gives us stories instead of catch-phrases.

One of the more common criticisms against Obama is that he is all charisma and lacks the experience to run the White House.

That particular argument isn't entirely truthful, as Obama already has legislated on avian flu, genetic testing, opening up the budgetary process and non-proliferation, to name a few. But more importantly, that charisma earned through storytelling is exactly what we need for a president.

It's right for us to demand a level of competence from our politicians, and Obama already has cleared that bar. But we're in an age of political polarization, of people being locked into parties and refusing to consider anything from the other side. Political operatives have made careers out of "firing up the base" and continuing to cement our differences.

It might sound naive or silly, but a president who can convince voters to consider the other side would be a wonderful change from the way things are. Through his stories, Barack Obama has done that, and will continue to do so from the White House if we give him the chance.

EMBRYONIC STEM CELL ISSUE THAWS BELIEFS

TRIBUNE MEDIA SERVICES

For a generation, American politics largely has been frozen in place when it comes to so-called "reproductive issues."

Abortion has been the keystone holding up a number of related positions, from euthanasia to embryonic stem cell research, with self-described pro-lifers and pro-choicers locked in a permanent cold war.

But the light of science is melting the permafrost beneath them, making abortion seem like a 20th-century argument about feminism whereas the argument in the 21st century will be about humanity itself – and whether science is the source of human values.

Tellingly, in the past, both sides in the abortion wars have claimed science as their ally in the fight over when life begins.

Embryonic stem cell research, however, has changed the focus of that argument because, for reasons good and bad, ESCR advocates want to stop talking about those who are pro-life and start calling their opponents "anti-science," as if being anti-science – whatever that means – is an immoral stance.

SHIH TZUS ELUDE CAPTURE, RELY ON ACTS OF KINDNESS

ATLANTA JOURNAL CONSTITUTION

It's telling that one of metro Atlanta's most upscale counties isn't being overrun by packs of fearsome pit bulls or even ill-tempered beagles.

Instead, the fanged scourges of an east Cobb condominium complex are a band of stray Shih Tzus, diminutive dogs that look positively adorable with frilly bows tied on their heads.

So much for street cred.

The dogs, apparently a Shih Tzu mix, have been roaming around the Covered Bridge condos near Powers Ferry Road since late November, living by their wits and relying on the kindness of strangers. Small but crafty, they've repeatedly eluded capture while tugging at the heartstrings of condo owners, who have provided the staples needed to survive in the "wild" – food, water and fluffy toys.

EXHIBIT FEATURES THE ART OF ABU GHRAIB PRISON

SAN FRANCISCO GATE

At least two questions hang over the exhibit of Fernando Botero's paintings and drawings on the shameful abuses at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq that will open at the main library at University of California, Berkeley, a week from today.

The first is what drove Botero, who typically draws whimsical, oversized pneumatic figures that have enormous popular appeal, to undertake these paintings in the first place.

The second is why they'll be displayed in a Berkeley library, rather than in the Museum of Modern Art, the Guggenheim in New York, or San Francisco Museum Of Modern Art.

Let's start with the first question.

The 73-year-old Colombian artist spent 14 months painting a series of 80 drawings and paintings that depict pain, degradation and torture – all in the style of his more popular work.

PIG FARMER ACCUSED OF KILLING 26 WOMEN IN CANADA GOES TO TRIAL

NEW WESTMINSTER, British Columbia - Years after their loved ones disappeared from the seedy streets of Vancouver's red-light district, families learned some of the gruesome details of how the women allegedly were killed.

Some relatives fled the courtroom; others stayed, but sat in tears as prosecutors detailed the case against Robert Pickton.

Pickton, a 56-year-old pig farmer, showed no emotion during Monday's session. Clean-shaven with a bald crown and shoulder-length hair, he sat in a specially built defendant's box surrounded by bulletproof glass.

Arrested five years ago, Pickton has been charged with killing 26 women and has pleaded not guilty to the six counts covered the first trial. The other 20 counts will be heard at a later trial.

Prosecutor Derrick Prevett stunned the courtroom by saying Pickton told investigators, including an undercover officer planted in his jail cell, that he had slain 49 women.

"I was going to do one more and make it an even 50," Prevett quoted Pickton as telling investigators. "I made my own grave by being sloppy."

EXPERTS PREDICT MOST GLACIERS WILL VANISH FROM ALPS BY 2050

VIENNA, Austria - Glaciers will all but disappear from the Alps by 2050, scientists warned Monday, basing their bleak outlook on mounting evidence of slow but steady melting of the continental ice sheets.

In western Austria's Alpine province of Tyrol, glaciers have been shrinking by about 3 percent a year, said Roland Psenner of the University of Innsbruck's Institute for Ecology.

And 2050 is a conservative estimate, he said: If they keep melting at that rate, most glaciers could vanish by 2037.

"The future looks rather liquid," he said.

Experts at a regional conference on the Alps, held annually in the mountain resort of Alpbach, stopped short of blaming global warming. But they called for a review of preventive measures to protect people living in valleys at risk of dangerous flooding.

Runoff from melting glaciers caused severe flooding that devastated parts of Switzerland in the summer of 2005.

BOMBS STRIKE SHIITE TARGETS; 137 DEAD ACROSS IRAQ

BAGHDAD, Iraq - A suicide bomber crashed his car into a central Baghdad market crowded with Shiites just seconds after another car bomb tore through the stalls where vendors were hawking DVDs and used clothing, leaving 88 dead Monday in the bloodiest attack in two months.

The bombings, along with a double bombing that killed 12 people in the town of Khalis, battered Shiites during one of their holiest festivals. The attacks were the latest in a renewed campaign of insurgent violence in advance of a U.S.-Iraqi security operation.

In all, 137 people were killed or found dead across Iraq, including a teacher who was gunned down as she was on her way to work at a girls' school in a mainly Sunni area of Baghdad. The toll also included the bullet-riddled bodies of at least 30 people, apparent victims of death squads largely run by Shiite militias.

— The Associated Press

gram now operates with annual expenses of more than $2 million and generates more than $1 million in revenue, according to the equity disclosure form.

FOLLOWING THE RULES

The goal of Title IX, Hancock said, is to "ensure your women athletes and your men athletes have the opportunity to excel and be the best they can be."

However, budgets prevail. Compliance has come at the cost of some men's programs, and opportunities for men have been cut to provide the funding necessary to add women's teams to equalize participant numbers.

To comply with Title IX, the athletics department most recently added women's rowing and equestrian teams, in 1996 and 2000, respectively. Tietjen said these sports were expected to have the highest interest levels and the greatest likelihood of drawing in-state athletes.

Teresa Slough, head equestrian coach, said Title IX "had everything to do" with the choice to form a women's equestrian team at K-State. She said the athletics department saw an equestrian team, which is offered at only four Big 12 universities, as a good fit for the university, especially because its roster includes 77 women, 69 of whom are on scholarship.

Slough said the team has benefited from its addition as a K-State intercollegiate sport, especially through the $185,002 operating budget from the athletics department.

"It's been a great thing for us," she said. "It's kind of unfortunate the government has to mandate it, but we've reaped some pretty great benefits."

Despite these upsides, former equestrian rider Riley Zarda, junior in print journalism, said she thinks the mandates of Title IX are unnecessary.

"While I support women's athletics, I don't think men's and women's teams absolutely have to be equal number for number," she said. "It makes me feel like we are just there to justify men's athletics."

The biggest obstacle to compliance is obtaining the necessary funding, said Steve Rock, a reporter who covered sports for the Kansas City Star for 10 years.

A PRICE TO PLAY

Spending is not a proportionality test, as K-State's equity disclosure form indicates. The dollar amounts allocated to men's and women's athletics programs do not have to be equal for an institution to be in compliance with Title IX.

Total operating expenses for K-State's men's teams in 2006 are $2,340,913, while operating expenses for women's teams total $1,806,669, according to the university's equity disclosure form.

Football and men's basketball are the only two self-sustaining athletic programs at K-State, with football generating nearly $10 million in net revenue, according to the equity disclosure form. No women's sport makes a profit.

The average salary for a men's team head coach is $334,874, nearly four times that of a women's team head coach, according to the equity disclosure form.

Athletically related student aid is another piece of the funding puzzle that differs greatly between men's and women's sports. Men's teams divvy out 59 percent, about $2.5 million, of the more than $4 million K-State awards in athletic scholarships, leaving women with 41 percent, or $1.7 million, according to the equity disclosure form.

BACK TO BASICS

Boys against girls is an age-old battle. Title IX simply serves to intensify that battle.

Men face the prospect of losing teams in the name of equalizing opportunities for athletes of both genders. Women typically deal with smaller budgets and less publicity. It seems everyone loses under this legislation, players said.

Players, officials and observers all say Title IX, in theory, is a positive plan for leveling athletic opportunities at institutions of higher education. In practice, however, they say it rarely works out as smoothly or effectively, despite the leaps forward women's athletics have made since the legislation's implementation.

Zarda, on the equestrian team, described the frustration.

"I support women's athletics and love the team, but I don't support Title IX."

Surprise of the game

The poor attendance at Bramlage

After only 8,850 fans showed up for Wednesday's 69-60 win over Baylor, coach Bob Huggins called out the fans. He said he didn't want to put his name on something that wasn't done right. The fans still seem to be a problem, as just 8,300 people were in attendance against Chicago State on Monday. Fans purchased more than 12,000 tickets for both games. The last time attendance was more than 10,000 at Bramlage Coliseum was against Texas Tech. Fans will get another chance Saturday against Nebraska.

Turning point

Luis Colon's opening layup

With 19:35 remaining, Colon scored the game's first basket on a left-handed jump shot in the lane. That was the last time the game was tied and Chicago State never even took the lead. The Wildcats outbounded the Cougars 44-34 and finished with 12 blocks. Chicago State shot 22 percent from the field. The Cougars' leading scorer coming into the game, David Holston, only scored three points.

Freshman Jason Bennett recorded a K-State single-game record eight blocks. He previously was tied with Tony Kitt and Dramane Diarra for the lead with six. Bennett blocked six during a 78-48 loss to California on Nov. 29. He also had a five-block performance against Cleveland State.

Game MVP

After scoring 25 points and pulling down five rebounds, senior Cartier Martin seems to be settling into his role as the Wildcats' sixth man. He came off the bench for the third game in a row against Chicago State and has played that role in five of the last six games. Despite coming off the bench, he still has managed to score double figures in the last three games. During a 69-60 win over Iowa State on Saturday, Martin scored 17 and grabbed six rebounds.

Overmatched

Nonconference opponent Chicago State out-played by Wildcats in all aspects

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's basketball team had a night off from Big 12 Conference play. That wasn't good news for the Chicago State Cougars, who probably wished the Wildcats had taken the night off altogether.

Playing a nonconference game amid their conference schedule for the first time since the Big 12's inception in 1996, the Wildcats defeated Chicago State 73-36 Monday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

And they made it look easy.

Led by senior Cartier Martin's 25-point performance, the Wildcats (14-6, 3-2 Big 12) scored first and never looked back. They used runs of 13-5 and 14-7 to take a commanding 38-17 lead into the half.

Junior David Hoskins finished with 15 points and 10 rebounds, recording his second straight double-double.

Martin, who came off the bench for the fifth time in six games, converted on 11-of-15 shots. Once a starter, Martin seemingly has found a comfort zone with his new role.

"Early in the year (coach Bob Huggins) told us that he needed one of his best players to come off the bench and give the team a spark," Martin said. "I feel like I've done that."

Chicago State (8-16) — an independent school formerly of the Mid-Continent Conference — came into the game having already played teams from the Big 10, Big 12 and Pac-10 conferences. The Cougars failed to give themselves much of an opportunity to win any of them, however, and this game was no exception.

The Cougars couldn't find an answer for K-State's inside game, as the Wildcats scored 46 points in the paint and made 16 layups. The Cougars also struggled to find a rhythm offensively, shooting just 22 percent on 14-of-63 from the field and falling well below their season average of 44 percent.

"I was pleased with the way we defended. I look out there and it was a totally different team than it was against William & Mary, when we were banging into each other," Huggins said. "It's going to get to the point now where if you don't play well, you're going to stick out like a sore thumb."

That's essentially what happened to Chicago State.

The Wildcats used relentless pressure on the Cougars and held them to their lowest point total of the season. The Cougars' previous low was 44 points in a loss to Southeastern Louisiana on Dec. 12. They came into the game averaging 72.2 points per game.

Freshman Jason Bennett, the Wildcats' tallest player at 7-foot-3, was the big reason why.

Bennett set a single-game Wildcat record with eight blocks, though his best performance may have come in celebration.

After each of his final two blocks, Bennett waved his index finger into the air, prompting the crowd of 8,300 to rise to its feet.

"I saw (NBA player) Dikembe Mutombo do that and I said, 'I got to start doing that,'" Bennett said. "When I'm on the court, I'm trying to be the angriest person out there. I don't care if I hurt you or not."

With four wins in a nine-day stretch, the Wildcats are far from hurting.

"I think we still have some progress to make, but I think we're coming along," Martin said. "We're starting to play our best basketball, and what better time than to do that than right here in conference play?"

K-State's Cartier Martin goes up for a shot in the Wildcat's 73-36 win over Chicago State. Martin put up 22 points in the Wildcat's fourth-straight victory. Catrina Rawson COLLEGIAN

K-State's freshmen, big men need to step up for Big 12 Conference play

ANALYSIS

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although K-State is on a four-game win streak and appears to be playing its best basketball of the season, something still is missing — size.

K-State has found success playing a smaller lineup. During that four-game stretch, freshmen big men Jason Bennett and Luis Colon played 26 minutes combined in wins against Missouri and Iowa State.

With the Big 12 Conference season in full swing, K-State can no longer put the freshmen on the court and hope they will figure out how to play. Coach Bob Huggins has to go with what works. And right now, Bennett and Colon aren't cutting it.

During K-State's 73-36 win over Chicago State Monday at Bramlage Coliseum, Bennett and Colon logged a combined 34 minutes. Huggins probably wanted to get the pair more minutes before Big 12 play starts up again.

Colon made his third-straight start. All season, Huggins said the players who show the most effort in practice will start the game.

Against Chicago State, Colon worked hard at boxing out and running up and down the floor. Colon turned his hustle into an effective night, grabbing five rebounds.

Colon's ability to stay aggressive without getting into foul trouble was another positive for him (he finished with zero fouls). Against Missouri, Colon picked up three fouls in only nine minutes because he was constantly out of position on defense.

While Colon managed a solid performance, Bennett still doesn't look like the highly rated center prospect K-State thought it would get. At 7-foot-3 and 265 pounds, there shouldn't be many players in the Big 12 who can manhandle Bennett.

Yet Chukwumah Chidozie, Chicago State's skinny 7-footer, pushed Bennett out of the lane all night. He should have used Monday as a tune-up for his post moves, but instead didn't even try to work his way inside.

"I just need to get lower and get stronger," Bennett said. "I'm not very strong right now."

However, Bennett can still swat shots, finishing with a K-State single-game record eight blocks, but he already has proven he can rack up the blocks against poor competition (he blocked five against Cleveland State).

Even though the Wildcats' small lineup has been successful, they will soon be tested by the Big 12's best big men. That will start when Nebraska and its talented post, junior Aleks Maric, come to Manhattan Saturday.

Huggins called Maric one of the best low-post scorers in the Big 12. If Bennett and Colon can't step up, look for Maric to put up monster numbers.

Poor draft choices hinder Chiefs' postseason opportunities

The Indianapolis Colts and Chicago Bears spent the weekend punching their tickets to the Super Bowl.

Meanwhile, the Kansas City Chiefs sat at home — for the 37th straight year — punching themselves.

Sad, but true: all is not well at 1 Arrowhead Drive. Not when the team has an aging roster; not when the team has more questions than answers; not when the team has General Manager Carl Peterson making all the decisions.

JEFF RAKE

Peterson, the longest-tenured general manager in professional sports at 18 years, has failed to get his team in position to even sniff a Super Bowl berth (for the first time since 1970).

The Chiefs haven't won a playoff game since 1994 — when Joe Montana was quarterback, Bill Clinton was president and Pulp Fiction was the No. 1 movie at the box office.

Twenty other teams have made the Super Bowl since that time, and 28 have won a playoff game. Only three teams — the Houston Texans, Detroit Lions and Cincinnati Bengals — have failed to win a playoff game during that stretch. Yes, even the Cleveland Browns have won more recently.

So what direction do the Chiefs go from here? Your guess is as good as mine. Peterson has never been one to map out a plan and stick to it.

But when you look at the teams that are having success (and the Colts and Bears certainly are two of them), you'll find that there's one commonality: they draft well.

Even a broken clock is right twice a day. But on draft day, Peterson is almost never right. And if the Chiefs are going to have a chance at catching some of the elite teams in the NFL over the next several years, they'll have to start getting more for their money in the draft.

That means no five-year stretches like the one Peterson had from 1998 to 2002. Of the 35 selections Peterson made during that time, just three of them — Ryan Sims, Greg Wesley and Dante Hall — are on the current roster. All three are candidates to be cut in the offseason.

Quite the opposite for the Colts and Bears, two teams that have drafted exceptionally well and have rosters loaded with young talent.

The Chiefs can't continue to draft poorly and plug their holes with veteran free agents. That strategy leads to a roster that's old.

Sort of like long-suffering Chiefs fans.

Peterson has three years left on what is believed to be his final contract before he retires.

That probably means at least three more years until the Chiefs have a chance at making their Super Bowl dreams become a reality.

N-9 condom may not be safest option

By Matt Combs

SEXUAL HEALTH AWARENESS PEER EDUCATORS

Flash! Zoom! The enemy barely escapes as a plasma beam heats its port side. A loopy-loop maneuver is followed by another as the dogfight continues. The allied fighter pursues, lines his victim in sights, and fires. Boom! A huge explosion as the enemy fighter falls from the sky amidst the ensuing battle.

No, this is not the newest installation of the "Star Wars" movies. It also is not the latest Nintendo Wii video game. It is a battle ensuing inside spermicidal condoms everywhere — granted, a little glamorized.

Condoms with spermicidal lubrication are a great tool in safer sexual health practices. We've all have heard the powers of N-9, but are they true?

So what is N-9? It is abbreviation for nonoxynol-9, the chemical used to make spermicidal gels, foams, etc. The way it works, according to the book "Sexual Etiquette 101," is by attacking the tail and body of the sperm, lowering mobility and nourishment. Basically, it keeps the little swimmers from making it all the way on their magical journey.

This sounds perfect, and we should all run out and buy condoms with this magical substance, correct? Perhaps not — what many people overlook is that this chemical in no way protects either individual against sexually transmitted diseases.

A condom with N-9 lubrication has the same protection of one without when it comes to keeping you from visiting the health clinic for some penicillin.

According to the World Health Organization, although N-9 helps a small amount in preventing pregnancy when used as a foam, there is no evidence condoms with N-9 prevent pregnancy any more than those without. In fact, WHO states condoms with N-9 should no longer be promoted.

That's because N-9, when used occasionally — let's say one time a day — is fine. However, if used too frequently it can cause vaginal irritation, leaving the vagina more susceptible to STDs. So if sex is your profession, or you just really, really enjoy having sex, N-9 definitely is not for you.

Finally, for alternative sexual practices it is a bad idea. N-9 has a taste that is far from pleasant — and yes, for the purpose of truth in this article I in fact did lick an N-9 condom to find out. I would not suggest it.

What's more, for anal sex it is risky. Research by the CDC (Centers for Disease Control and Prevention) has found that even small amounts of N-9 can cause large amounts of short-term damage to the rectal lining.

This in turn, much like with the vagina, leaves this area of the body more susceptible for Human Immunodeficiency Virus and other STDs during anal intercourse. Therefore, if going for the other entrance, keep N-9 out of the picture.

If used only occasionally, for vaginal sex only, a condom with N-9 is OK, and much better than no condom at all.

UK-based group gets back to basics

Clinic, "Visitations"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

According to art-punk quartet Clinic's Myspace.com Web site, the band's largest focus is "Ignoring the tenets and trends of the music industry."

For a band that so boldly attempts to subvert the musical landscape, it is disappointing that Clinic has taken such a predictable trajectory during its career.

After a series of highly lauded EPs, Clinic released its debut, "Internal Wrangler," in 2000 to much acclaim in the indie music press. Clinic had created an experimental sound filled with short, spazzy bursts of fuzzed-out, surf-rock guitars, aloof organ lines and often-indistinguishable lyrics from lyricist Ade Blackburn. To this day, it sounds like almost nothing else.

In 2002, Clinic's sophomore effort, "Walking with Thee," saw the band refine its sound while changing its formula very little. Even with the loss in immediacy, "Walking with Thee" was a solid album, and drew much praise, especially from the mainstream music press. The album even garnered a Grammy nomination for "Best Alternative Album."

Two years later, Clinic released its third album, "Winchester Cathedral." After the baby steps taken between its first and second albums, Clinic did the foreseeable third album procedure by trying to expand its sound into unforeseen territories. This proved to be a lark, however, and what should have been exciting turned out to be rote and banal with few exceptions (mainly the beautiful ballad, "Falstaff").

Today is the U.S. release of Clinic's fourth album, "Visitations." It is the return-to-form album, and while not as brilliant as Clinic's earlier work, it finds Clinic hungrier and more ambitious creating a concise album that barely breaks the 30-minute mark and revisits the grungier sound of "Internal Wrangler."

Opening track, "Family" is an excellent example of the more spastic side of Clinic's sound. A fuzzy guitar figure spits out a disjointed hook over bouncy, toe-tapping percussion thumps. During all of this cacophony, Blackburn yelps fragmented lyrics like a madman before the song ends with a bang — literally.

"Animal/Human" begins rather controlled as a heavily psychedelic doo-wop track with minimalist percussion, washes of guitar and Blackburn's reverberated vocals. It then segues into a more feral section with a booming bass line, thundering percussion and a boom-chick-a-wow guitar straight from a 70s porn flick.

The next few songs find the band spinning its wheels in a creative rut. First single, "Harvest," is Clinic by the books, and "Paradise" is the album's languid ballad that, unfortunately, lacks the vulnerability evident in earlier ballads by the band. Not to mention, it sounds almost exactly like "Kimberley," one of the band's earliest songs.

However, a mid-album creative streak helps the band recover from earlier missteps. "Children of Kellogg" begins with a small sample from one of my favorite overtures before the band is off and running with a lumbering groove filled with a wall of guitar, blaring organ lines and a sprinkling of xylophone. The song ends with a beautiful coda — it is entirely unexpected, and is a sound I wish Clinic had explored further.

"If You Could Read Your Mind," is gypsy psych-rock peppered with crashing theremins and an excellent guitar riff, while "Jigsaw Man" finds the band busting out its acoustic guitars and a variety of percussion to create a twisted folk rave-up.

Ultimately, "Visitations" is an improvement over the band's most recent output. The album contains enough highlights to recommend it to fans of the band, but for Clinic newbies, I would suggest checking out "Internal Wrangler" before immersing yourself into the twisted world of this distinct band.

Artist performs at The Dusty Bookshelf

By Eric Brown
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Even had I known it would be this cold in Kansas, I still would have come here to play for you tonight," Laura Gibson said to the crowd inside the Dusty Bookshelf Sunday night.

Much to the delight of the concert attendees who braved the elements that night, Gibson, a 27-year-old singer/songwriter, played a 12-song set of quiet, acoustic lullabies. The performance in the bookstore featured Gibson on vocals and guitar, with Cory Gray on keyboard, trumpet, glockenspiel and backup vocals.

The show also included opening sets by Joey Murphy, also known as Aid, and Margo May playing with Jake Acosta.

More than 50 attendees nestled into the bookstore to watch Gibson's show, which was part of her three-week tour that ends in late January when she returns to her hometown of Portland, Ore. Gibson's trip to Manhattan was her first to the state of Kansas.

While Gibson has played larger venues recently, she said she had no problem performing in the bookstore.

"I love the atmosphere of this place," Gibson said. "It has the same feel as playing at someone's house. It's very cozy and intimate. And the crowd was wonderful. There were so many people here, especially considering the weather tonight."

Although Gibson had no blankets or coats to offer those who battled the cold to watch her perform, she did offer them her first full-length album, which possesses plenty of warmth in her voice; a beautiful, breathy hush.

On her album, "If You Come to Greet Me," released this past November, Gibson's guitar accompaniment matches the delicacy of her amazing whisper as though they're competing to see which can be more silently powerful.

This quiet combination creates a musical blend that resembles the likes of Patsy Cline, Aimee Mann, and Iron & Wine. But with her own musical touch, she weaves these individuals' styles into one that is all her own.

Gibson's only other recorded work is her EP, "Amends," which she released in 2004. According to her Web site, she only performed at local nursing homes back in Oregon before recording the EP.

Standing in a line against the wall, 12 cadets dressed in camouflage cheered on two of their peers as they worked on their combative skills Tuesday night.

Dave Durnil, instructor of the program, said he does not usually see as much camaraderie as he does at K-State.

"Not like that," he said. "This group has a strong class with strong leaders. Units want to get each other through it."

The cadets are part of the nation's first ROTC hand-to-hand combatives program. It began last semester after K-State President Jon Wefald had heard about the program and the success with soldiers on military bases, said Dave Durnil, who is a U.S. combatives instructor.

"When they go into the Army or the Air Force, they receive combatives training," Durnil said. "With this program, they get a heads up."

Kyle Boomer, sophomore in civil engineering and Air Force ROTC cadet, said when he heard about the program, it seemed like a great idea.

"You can have fun and learn skills," Boomer said. "I'm learning a lot and having a great time."

Alex Dibenedetto, who was an Army Ranger-elite and served in Afghanistan and Iraq, also is an instructor for the course. Art DeGroat, director of military affairs and adviser to the program, said Durnil is a "world-class military combatives instructor."

"We are fortunate to get one of the best," DeGroat said.

Durnil is a master in Brazilian Jiu-jitsu and in combatives. He is also a colleague of Matt Larsen, the founder of the national combatives program.

Combatives is a mixture of Brazilian Jiu-jitsu, wrestling, judo, boxing, Muay Thai, Kali and other hand-to-hand sports.

"It's kind of a buffet," Durnil said.

While cadets in the combatives program are learning physical hand-to-hand combat, the program focuses on using technique, Durnil said.

"It's basically a military school where we teach modern Army combatives," he said. "It is Army developed. We teach a fight plan and how to execute and teach technique."

By learning technique, cadets are able to fight regardless of their body shape or size, DeGroat said.

Cadets in the program are taught to train other people how to use technique while they fight, including other cadets, friends and family.

"They learn to properly and safely teach the technique to others," DeGroat said. "They learn ethical dimension, and they know what they can and can't do."

Durnil said the program is one example of how K-State's ROTC programs are among the best in the country.

"They're giving the opportunity to train, and the program is equipping cadets," he said.

Man arrested on charges of possession

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Police arrested a Manhattan man Monday on charges relating to the possession of marijuana, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department said.

Mark Edward Baker, address not given, was arrested for possession of marijuana with the intent to distribute.

Additional charges include, driving with a suspended license, driving under the influence, and obstruction of the legal process, Quintanar said.

A routine traffic stop led to the arrest.

"He was stopped for a traffic matter and found to be on a suspended license," Quintanar said.

Officers found 19 individual bags of marijuana in the vehicle, Quintanar said.

The total amount of marijuana was 19.6 grams.

Bond was set at $10,000.

Morning steam leak shuts building down

By Austin Apple
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A steam leak at the power plant on campus Tuesday morning led to the cancellation of lab classes from 1 to 3 p.m. in King, Ackert, and Chalmers halls and the Chemistry/Biochemistry buildings due to the lack of heat.

"We got the people who were working in the power plant out and then back into the building in protective clothing," Steve Galitzer, director of public safety, said.

Old equipment, old plumbing, and old, failing valves can cause leaks, Galitzer said.

"Leaks occur all the time," Galitzer said.

Old piping is what led to this steam leak, said Ed Heptig, director of facilities maintenance.

"The leak was discovered by the employees in the power plant when they saw the steam coming out of the insulation," he said.

No buildings were affected by the asbestos, he added.

"The leak was contained to the room where the boilers are kept," Heptig said.

Facilities does regular maintenance but cannot predict where the next leak will be, he said.

"We have suspect material that we check routinely and do work if necessary," Heptig said.

Students who were affected by the closing were notified.

"I got an e-mail about the steam leak, but none of my classes were cancelled," Sara Muetting, senior in biology, said.

Bush covers war, troop increase in State of the Union

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

President Bush delivered his State of the Union address Tuesday night, facing a listening Congress comprised, for the first time, of a minority of his own party.

"We enter the year 2007 with large endeavors to begin, and others that are ours to begin," he said. "I congratulate the Democratic majority. Congress has changed; our responsibility has not."

White House officials announced earlier in the day that the President's address would sacrifice specifics for breadth. This was a plan the President followed as he moved from the federal deficit and earmarks to healthcare, immigration and energy reform before a more lengthy appeal for support in current efforts to stabilize Iraq.

Broad discussions on politically neutral topics, such as increased healthcare coverage, alleviating oil dependency and balanced federal budgets drew warm responses from both sides of the aisle. While more divisive issues, such as tax increases, guest worker programs and Iraq troop increases evidenced still-existing divides.

"Usually State of the Unions are kind of a laundry list," said Ben Davis, president of College Republicans. "We all knew Iraq would be front and center in the speech."

Issues such as immigration and social security reform failed to gain traction under the Republican-led Congress and drew deep fissures in GOP politics. But, Davis, senior in political science, said as elections edge closer, overcoming murky issues will become increasingly important.

"They want to get this issue out of the way, because they're looking '08, and they don't want it to be a divisive issue," he said. "Get it through, get it implemented, and be done with it."

Though the President's speech focused heavily on upcoming initiatives, Democrat responses have expressed skepticism at the reality and feasibility of many of the President's claims.

Senator Jim Webb, D-Va., delivered the democratic response and called Bush's economic optimism into question, expressing concern at the lack of corporate profit sharing, rising medical costs and depressed wages.

"I can understand where he's coming from wanting to create more American jobs and less dependency on foreign oil," said Aaron Apel, president of Young Democrats. "(But) it seems like he wants to create this United States island where nobody can come in or no American jobs can go overseas."

Apel, junior in philosophy, said policies which remove the U.S. from world markets create a sense of elitism which fuels anti-American sentiment.

Picking your nose: good info on a bad habit

All of us have caught someone in the act of picking his or her nose, and others have caught most of us picking our own.

Some make bogus excuses when spotted, while others see no point in hiding the habit and do so without embarrassment.

NAMING THAT HABIT

Technically, nose picking should be called "rhinotillexomania."

Rhino for "nose," tillexis for "habit of picking at something," and mania for "obsession with something."

This makes someone with a digit up their nose a "rhinotillexomaniac."

WHAT'S IN A BOOGER?

Mucus is the main ingredient of a booger: the thin, sticky stuff produced in nostrils. The air people inhale contains lots of tiny particles, including dust, dirt, germs and pollen.

If these particles made their way down to the lungs, they could cause damage, so mucus, together with nasal hairs (cilia), helps filter these particles out and keep them in the nose.

The mucus dries out around the particles, resulting in a booger.

The texture of boogers varies from squishy and slimy to tough and crumbly, depending on the amount of mucus.

— Excerpt from the book, "Habitus Disgustica: The Encyclopedia of Annoying, Rude, and Unpleasant Behavior," by Ian Whitelaw

A scientific paper titled, "Rhinitillixomania: Psychiatric Disorder or Habit?" from the Journal of Clinical Psychiatry published the results of a questionnaire sent to Wisconsin residents.

- 91 percent had picked their nose some time in the past and most were still digitally active.
- 25.6 percent admitted to picking their noses daily, 22.3 percent two to five times each day, and three people acknowledged doing it hourly.
- 82.8 percent had picked their noses to "unclog the nasal passages," 66.4 percent to relieve discomfort or itchiness, 35.7 percent to get rid of a booger hanging from their nose, 34 percent for personal hygiene, and 17.2 percent picked simply as a habit.
- 8.7 percent claimed never to have picked their nose.
- 18 percent reported nosebleeds, while 0.8 percent admitted to picking a hole in their nasal septum, the wall between the nostrils.
- 2.1 percent claimed to pick solely for the sheer joy of it. One sad soul picks for sexual stimulation.
- 55.5 percent spent 1-5 minutes, 23.5 percent spent 5-15 minutes, and 0.8 percent spent 15-30 minutes each day nose picking. One person devoted more than 2 hours each day to this habit.
- 65.1 percent used their index finger, 20.2 percent used their pinky, and 16.4 percent used their thumb as their instrument of choice.

USA Today reporter speaks on food safety, press

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Previous bacterial scares have changed people's eating habits, and vegetables are the most recent casualty, said a USA Today science reporter Tuesday.

Elizabeth Weise, who began writing at USA Today about biotechnology in 1997, said the fuss about vegetable safety is related to previous worries about meat.

There was controversy in the 1990s about the safety of uncooked meat.

In 1993, after an outbreak of E.coli at Jack in the Box restaurants, many people considered raw hamburger meat a biohazard, Weise said.

Now vegetables are getting all the attention. People once thought even bad vegetables wouldn't kill you, they just might get a little slimy and taste bad, Weise said. But all that has changed.

outbreak killed four people and made 200 ill.

"This was the first time the FDA came out and held one of those great press conferences," Weise said. "It was interesting because we had the FDA again being very straightforward."

Similar outbreaks in lettuce, botulism in fresh carrot juice and two outbreaks of salmonella linked to tomatoes followed the outbreak in September.

In November, 140 people became ill after eating shredded lettuce from Taco Bell and Taco John's contaminated with E.coli.

"That really tipped public opinion," Weise said. "It wasn't only spinach. People were afraid to eat lettuce and were using it as an excuse to not eat their vegetables."

Weise also spoke about the influence of salmonella and mad cow disease breakouts on the public.

The handling of the mad cow disease outbreak set the expectations for how other foodborne illnesses would be taken care of, Weise said.

When mad cow made its way to the United States, reporters expected the same daily briefings Canadian and other foreign citizens received. As a result, the question of meat safety was all over the news.

Since then, the question of meat safety has faded out of the news.

"The meat industry really got its act together," Weise said. "I mean, they made a number of significant changes."

Students and faculty filled Union 212 to learn more about the United States' recent problems with vegetables.

Casey Cook, sophomore in agricultural business, said he received extra credit for attending the lecture but said he also was excited to hear what Weise had to say.

"I want to learn more about the breakouts," he said. "Maybe she has some suggestions about how to make this not happen again or some solutions on how to solve this problem."

Due to these outbreaks, the FDA and other health organizations adopted regulations to keep vegetables free of E.coli.

"It really has to be prevented from getting on the product in the first place," said Doug Powell, scientific director of K-State's Food Safety Network. "The focus should be on the farm rather than the kitchen."

For people worried about E.coli on their vegetables, Weise suggested buying vegetables separately, rather than an pre-made salad.

It is likely those vegetables were washed with hundreds of other vegetables, which could have contaminated them.

"Americans have very unreal expectations for their food," Weise said. "It's grown in the wild. I don't think they have any understanding of how easily things can go wrong. It's really remarkable how often things go right."

Elizabeth Weise, USA Today science reporter, gave a speech titled "Food Safety and The Press: Why Did We Suddenly Care About Veggies in 2006?" at K-State Student Union Tuesday afternoon.

City Commission bans concealed weapons on public city properties

By Willow Williamson
and Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission made several city properties off-limits to concealed firearms at its meeting Tuesday night.

Licenses to carry concealed weapons have been available since the beginning of the year. The licenses are available under the "Kansas Personal and Family Protection Act," which the Kansas Legislature adopted last year.

The act listed more than 20 places where concealed firearms remain illegal in Kansas, including city halls, municipal courts and colleges. It also allowed property owners to make concealed weapons illegal on their property by posting signs at the entrances. Initially, the act did not provide for signs for the locations it ruled off limits to concealed weapons.

City Attorney William Frost said the resolution had two purposes. First, it outlawed hidden weapons on city property not mentioned in the act like pools and parks. Second, it provided for signs on all such city property that marked them as off-limits.

Riley County Police Department Director Mike Watson said enforcing the law would be like any other law. Reports of illegally concealed weapons would likely be as common as reports of people overtly carrying weapons where they are illegal.

"I don't anticipate getting a lot of calls on this," Watson said. "I don't anticipate a whole lot of trouble with this."

Commissioner Mark Hatesohl was the only commissioner to vote against the resolution. He said the resolution was unnecessary because it would not do anything to keep unlicensed people from carrying hidden weapons.

Hatesohl said he saw licensed carriers of concealed weapons as a supplement to the police force in the event of extreme circumstances such as if someone were to open fire in a public park, in his example.

"All the safe, law-abiding gun owners will have to run back to their cars to get their guns," he said.

The commission also voted to expand the Transportation Development District in the downtown redevelopment project. Local government will collect a half-cent sales tax in the TDD to pay off bonds for public projects like street construction.

The original TDD included almost six acres of land near Tuttle Creek Boulevard and included Best Buy. The new district measures almost 22 acres and includes almost all land surrounded by Tuttle Creek Boulevard, Leavenworth Street, 4th Street and Bluemont Avenue.

There are a few gaps inside the TDD. Walgreens at the corner of Bluemont Avenue and Fourth Street and several lots within the outside boundaries of the TDD are excluded. Assistant City Manager Jason Hilgers said the gaps are pieces of land Dial Realty, the company behind the redevelopment project, currently does not own.

Hilgers said Dial arranged to purchase the remaining properties, but the TDD cannot apply to that land until Dial owns it completely. Walgreens will not be part of the TDD.

Commissioner Ed Klimek said drivers already take residential streets parallel to Anderson Avenue to avoid the stoplights and traffic on Anderson.

"We need to recognize that those are residential streets, and if we have cars going every which way to avoid traffic, we'll have problems," Klimek said.

The commission also chose to make parking illegal on Denison Avenue between Anderson and Kimball avenues.

TO THE POINT

Trust Bush's decision, trust troops

In the absence of all-encompassing evidence, sometimes you just have to have faith.

Tuesday night in his State of the Union address, President Bush touched on many topics, including healthcare, gasoline usage and the No Child Left Behind Act.

But instead of pinning himself down on the recent troop increase, Bush expanded to broader issues at hand.

We agree with Bush that failure in Iraq would hold more ramifications for the world than anyone can predict; it would be a disaster.

However, since we are not military geniuses ourselves, we rely on others to be right and have our best interests in mind.

Citizens should expect that those in charge consulted the proper authorities prior to the unveiling of the troop-increase plan.

Bush is an elected leader. If he says it's the best possible action to take at the moment, and his advisers have looked ahead to what future ramifications we should expect, why doubt him?

While we sympathize with the families left to hold down the fort, we support our troops' decision to volunteer their lives to fight where our county asks them to fight.

Our troops signed the dotted line. They chose to commit themselves to the service of the United States.

They trust Bush with their lives. We should trust that.

Let the system work, and stop whining.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Little Apple

Memories of small-town Manhattan remain even as city grows

Manhattan has a special place in the hearts of some – especially those who live here for longer than it takes to graduate from K-State.

With recent news of Starbucks coming to Aggieville and as development of the new Third Street shopping area progresses, Manhattan has become a rapidly growing city – big city dreams with a home-town atmosphere.

While new businesses and buildings are always exciting additions to any city, I have mixed feelings when it comes to the expansion of the Little Apple because I have lived here since I was 8 years old.

Seeing Manhattan grow is something many citizens have waited for.

Many people probably take for granted the booming development currently taking place.

But, for those of us who still remember the discount movie theater in Aggieville (which is now Varney's Book Store) or the go-kart track outside of town (which is now closed), seeing the small town of Manhattan multiply into an actual city has been a gradual adjustment.

The growing economy allows for more jobs and better variety. The opportunity for Manhattan to grow and attract more businesses has been long overdue.

With the news of more troops being stationed at Fort Riley and the Big Red One's return, contractors and businessmen alike have begun to anticipate the arrival of thousands more to the Manhattan area.

The city has always had the quaint appeal of a small, tucked-away place to sneak away for a weekend.

Now with the big chain businesses coming in and creating a more commercialized city, it is hard to find those areas of peacefulness that once hid in the corners.

It becomes easy to lose the magic and the quiet comforts of Manhattan when more and more buildings and companies are being built. But the nostalgic feeling that true Manhattanites have should be examined side by side with the excitement and benefits of a bigger city.

There will always be the memories of having to rake bag after bag of leaves from the crevices of my enormous backyard or the smell that blankets the city after a spring rain.

Personally, these memories are not as wonderful in any other city.

This is my home, and to see something so sentimental change over time is scary.

Yet it is also exciting, as is the prospect of eventually having to leave and enter the real world, only to find more changes when I return.

However, it is easy to adjust with the changes because it only takes a warm summer night at an "Arts in the Park" concert or sledding down the hills in CiCo Park with siblings to remember all the comforts of Manhattan.

These comforts still possibly can be found tucked into corners or down the street and to the left, if you know where to look.

KELSEY CHILDRESS

One must trust self to have relationship success

I am one singular sensation. Luckily today, I am not alone.

According to a recent U.S. Census Bureau report, more than half – 51 percent – of women live without a husband, freeing themselves from over-the-top relationship drama and fights over who steals the covers at night.

When it comes down to the perfect relationship, I admit I am a cynic. Like other 20-somethings out there – especially that 51 percent – I toy with the notion of true love, but I honestly have never put my faith in it.

My first boyfriend dates back to high school, when trips to a Sunday matinee, handholding and the occasional kiss were considerably risqué relationship moves. While a little more forward today, the lessons of my first relationships still carry through to my frustrating sexual hormones.

I've learned to take things slow, to learn more about that special someone and to respect each other's goals.

Despite how my perspective has matured, one eminent battle haunts my relationships: my battle with trust. This summer, I had fallen head-over-heels for one man. He embodied every sense of perfection to me: athleticism, ambition, creativity, intelligence and passion. He became the pinnacle of the man I wanted, and I made it my mission to make him mine.

We began seeing each other, opting into an occasional hangout. Our hangouts led to more touchy-feely, frisky times. The frisky times led to even lustier encounters.

Though the hot and steamy nights were just what my libido needed, my heart, let alone my mind, needed more. I needed a bit of trust, a bit of assurance, that this man I was falling for was the right investment.

The relationship economy is a market I have struggled with throughout my life. Don't get me wrong, though. I love dating men. But through a series of cheating boyfriends and heartache, I wonder which are safe investments and which ones should be dumped early for maximum profit.

With relationships, there are incredible risks. True, when the stakes are high, the losses are high. While I consider my relaxed beer drinking and not-so-stalker-of-a-girlfriend party habits to be the perfect balance to the standard neurotic girlfriend syndrome, I still lacked trust in this relationship.

I put the blame on him for not communicating his wants or needs. He was at fault for my misery and for the tears I shed. It was him, not me.

But I was wrong.

It was me. It was my fear of opening up. It was my fear of losing something I desperately wanted. My issues of trust were not just with him, but they were with me. I convinced myself the relationship would not work before it ever stood a chance.

It's important to have trust in the ones you love, but it is equally important to trust yourself. If you do not believe in everything you do, you are going to have one hell of a time convincing that special someone you're the proper investment. I failed to do that in this last relationship, and I'll be damned if I let myself do it again.

In regard to my next relationship investment, I think I just might take a few risks and put my trust in another man. To hear "I love you" for the first time, to find a bouquet of flowers at your doorstep or to just snuggle up with that special someone – these rewards in the relationship world are worth the gamble.

WORLD NEWS

FRENCH DOCTORS PERFORM PARTIAL FACE TRANSPLANT

PARIS — French doctors announced Tuesday that they had performed the world's third partial face transplant on a man whose face was disfigured by severe tumors, giving him a new nose, mouth and chin and replacing part of his cheeks.

Going into the 15-hour operation Sunday, the 29-year-old patient had such heavy tumors on his lips that it was difficult to speak or eat. The operation removed most of the tumors from his face, doctors said.

"The patient is doing well from a surgical point of view," chief surgeon Dr. Laurent Lantieri said at a news conference.

Still, he added, "We will have to wait many months for the results" — including whether the patient's body would accept the tissue, whether his new nerves would function correctly and whether he would psychologically accept his new face.

The patient suffered from a genetic condition known as neurofibromatosis, which causes tumors to grow on nerve tissue throughout the body, the doctors said. The patient had undergone some 30 to 40 operations over 10 years to try to improve his face's appearance, Lantieri said.

Jean-Paul Meningaud, another member of the medical team, said the patient's condition made him reclusive.

"Any day, all of us can go into a restaurant or have a coffee in a café, and he had reached a point where he could not do that," Meningaud said.

Doctors said one of the patient's main sources of suffering was that he could not get a job because of his appearance, though he has a degree.

Despite the lifelong risks that a transplant surgery poses, episodes of rejection or even death, the patient "didn't hesitate a single second," Lantieri said, adding that the patient was "serene" going into the surgery. New tumors cannot grow on the transplanted tissue.

Lantieri carried out the operation at Henri-Mondor hospital in the Paris suburb of Creteil. The patient remained sedated Tuesday and still had not seen a picture of himself.

FUNERAL OF SLAIN JOURNALIST DRAWS 100,000 MOURNERS

ISTANBUL, Turkey — More than 100,000 mourners choked the streets of Istanbul on Tuesday for the funeral of an Armenian journalist whose slaying sparked debate about freedom of expression and whether Turks of different ethnic groups can live together.

"We are all Armenians!" chanted mourners in an outpouring of affection for Hrant Dink, who had made enemies among nationalist Turks by labeling as genocide the mass killings of Armenians toward the end of the Ottoman Empire.

Dink was gunned down in broad daylight Friday outside his bilingual Turkish-Armenian newspaper, Agos.

The throngs virtually shut down central Istanbul as they marched five miles from the Agos offices to an Armenian Orthodox church for the funeral. Many carried placards that read: "We are all Hrant Dinks."

The 52-year-old journalist's daughter, Sera, held a framed portrait of her father and shed tears as she walked in front of the black hearse.

Mourners took off from work and school to join the procession, and thousands leaned out of their office windows to applaud, weep and throw flowers as the hearse passed.

Despite a request from his family not to turn the funeral into a protest, many also raised their fists at times shouting: "Shoulder to shoulder against fascism!" and "Murderer 301!" — a reference to the law that was used to prosecute Dink and others on charges of "insulting Turkishness."

Through his newspaper, Dink sought to encourage reconciliation between Turkey and Armenia. But he chose a dangerous path by making public statements about the mass killings of Armenians by Turks in the early 20th century — remarks that landed him in court.

CHINA STICKING TO ONE-CHILD POLICY DESPITE GENDER GAP

BEIJING — China will not loosen its one-child policy, despite a top family planning official's acknowledgment Tuesday that it was partly to blame for a worsening problem of too many boy babies and not enough girls in the nation.

In 2005, some 118 boys were born in China for every 100 girls. In some regions, the figure has hit 130 boys for every 100 girls; the average for industrialized countries is about 104 and 107 boys for every 100 girls.

Zhang Weiqing, minister of the National Population and Family Planning Commission, said the government is committed to solving gender imbalance within 10 to 15 years with education campaigns, punishments for sex-selective abortions and rewards — like retirement pensions — for parents of girls.

"This problem is a reality of country life in China," said Zhang. "We have a 2,000-year feudal history that considered men superior to women, that gave boys the right to carry on the family name and allowed men to be emperors while women could not."

He called gender imbalance "a very serious challenge for China."

Konza Prairie to begin docent training sessions

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's Konza Prairie Biological Station is looking for volunteers to serve as docents at the facility.

The Konza Prairie is an 8,600-acre native tallgrass prairie preserve, according to the KPBS Web site.

The Nature Conservancy and K-State own the preserve, and the K-State Division of Biology uses it as a field research station.

Visitors including school groups, clubs and conferences visit the prairie each year to participate in guided tours, educational programs and in-services and other special events.

Docents are trained volunteers who act as guides and provide instruction for visitors to the Konza Prairie.

Valerie Wright, a Konza environmental educator, said there were no restrictions limiting entrance to the docent training program.

"There are absolutely no qualifications for the program other than a love of the prairie and a desire to share information with others," she said. "A docent is a teacher."

The Konza Prairie Environmental Education Program provides the volunteer docents with training through a series of classes. The first class will begin at 9 a.m., Feb. 17 at the Hulbert Center, the Konza Prairie headquarters.

The training program consists of 11 sessions, which meet each Saturday from 9 a.m. to noon in the Konza Prairie Education Center, located in the lower level of the old Dewey Ranch House.

Training begins with an orientation session, followed by several field trips and other learning experiences. Classes include topics such as the prairie's natural history, policies, rules and regulations, ongoing research and techniques to educate visitors.

Wright said the program had about 80 active docents, and she expects to train 15 to 25 more people this year.

Volunteers vary in age and occupation. High school and college students, men and women of various occupations and retirees are involved in the program, because they share a passion for the Konza, Wright said.

"I think they really enjoy the out-of-doors, and they like knowing about the tallgrass prairie and meeting visitors to the prairie," she said.

"I personally enjoy helping people understand what the Konza Prairie is about — it's about conservation, education and research. I enjoy letting them know why it's here."

Larry Loomis, Manhattan resident, joined the docent program in 2004 after his retirement.

He said his interest in the Konza Prairie could be traced back to his childhood days.

"I was born and raised on a farm, and was associated with cattle and the grasslands," Loomis said. "Now that I've learned more about cattle, bison and the grasslands, it has been interesting and fulfilling to pass that information on to school kids."

His most important goal as a docent, he said, is educating children about the importance of preserving the tallgrass prairie.

"I try to show them what's out here and make them aware of the tallgrass prairie and how it fits into our background," Loomis said. "I tell them how few of these prairies are left and teach them that we have to preserve it so that, one day, their kids can come out and visit, too."

The educational program sponsors many tours and events as part of its general public program. These activities require more hours than general staff members can handle, which is why volunteers are essential, Wright said.

"Docents give a lot of their time and put in a lot of hours that the general staff could not," she said. "They are a major part of what we do."

Additionally, he said a guest-worker program for immigrants, would likely become bogged down by red tape and be ineffective.

Though the points of the speech were contested, Joseph Aistrup, department head of political science, said the change to a largely democrat audience was reflected in a change of style.

"The tone in which he delivered his address tonight was decidedly conciliatory. In many respects his speech tonight was of the strongest he's given," he said.

With all eyes on next year's election, Aistrup said many unbending issues might find their way to compromise.

"The true irony in this situation is both the Democrats and the president want to be bipartisan," he said.

"Neither wants to be blamed for having no policy successes. President Bush needs to have some type of success in order to really buoy his presidency and prove he's not a lame duck."

In a show of solidarity with the GOP, the president reasserted his stance against tax cuts and amnesty programs for immigrants.

But with two years left, Aistrup said this marked the beginning of a government split between two parties.

"I think in many respects, we saw a different President Bush," he said.

Out cold

Drink water to prevent influenza

Aw — what a beautiful time of year.

The snow is falling, spring break is only a couple months away, and Peyton Manning is once again trying to win a Super Bowl for the Colts. Isn't the season just lovely?

TRENT SCOTT

But wait, something else happens every year at this time, too. Something dark, something nasty, something that is possibly accompanied by periods of intense vomiting and diarrhea.

It's flu season — or as the illness is more correctly called, influenza. And I'm sure many of you know exactly what I'm talking about.

It seems like every spring semester I find myself either coughing up a lung or having a dull pain in my neck. It leads to me sleeping for 16 straight hours after almost overdosing on ibuprofen. But that's just my experience.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), the flu is a contagious respiratory illness caused by a viral infection and can lead to mild to severe illness and sometimes even death. The CDC also says the best way to avoid the flu is to get a flu vaccination.

However, not everyone is able to obtain the vaccine. Perhaps supplies are low, as they were last year, leaving only enough inoculations for those who are at risk for developing serious complications after contracting the flu. Maybe you're deathly afraid of needles. The CDC also recommends that some people, like those who are allergic to chicken eggs, should not be vaccinated without first consulting their physician.

In any case, you can take precautions to reduce your chances of catching the flu at home, class and the gym (see chart at right).

Trent Scott is a junior in nutrition and exercise science and American Council on Exercise certified personal trainer at Peters Recreation Complex. Please send comments to sports@pub.ksu.edu.

Outdoor activities keep students fit through winter

Don't let the winter cold and snow flurries bring down your workout routine.

By engaging in ordinary outdoor activities or cold-weather sports, you can still burn calories to maintain or lose weight. Before you step outside in the sub-zero temperatures, remember to bundle up by wearing gloves, a hat and layers of warm clothing; with the outer layer protecting against wind.

Remember that the air is cold outside. Be sure to allow your muscles more time to warm up before jumping right into your activity of choice.

In both indoor and outdoor activities, warming up the muscles before engaging in physical activity will prevent injuries such as sprains, strains and torn ligaments or tendons. Also be certain you are hydrated, even if you don't feel thirsty; take breaks as you need them.

Exercising will get your heart pumping, increase your oxygen intake and boost your energy level, something especially welcome in the chilly months of winter.

According to Smart Spot Magazine, 30 minutes of the following winter activities can make for a great cold-weather calorie burn. (Factors such as weather and exertion might affect calories burned).

Melissa Haug is a senior in public health nutrition and dietetics and a nutrition consultant and an American Council on Exercise certified personal trainer at Peters Recreation Complex. Please send comments to sports@pub.ksu.edu.

Winter exercise calorie chart

	Calories burned by a 130-pound person	Calories burned by a 150-pound person
■ Shoveling snow by hand (see photo)	234	270
■ Ice-skating with moderate effort	273	315
■ Downhill skiing with moderate effort	234	270
■ Walking in snow shoes	312	360
■ Sledding and then walking back up the hill	273	315
■ Walking at a pace of about 3.5 mph (17-minute mile)	148	171
■ Running at a pace of about 6 mph (10-minute mile)	390	450

Note: Due to the sudden increase in heart rate and blood pressure that accompanies shoveling, researchers have reported an increase in the number of fatal heart attacks.

If you have high cholesterol or high blood pressure, have had a heart attack or have a history of heart attacks in your family, you might want to see a doctor before tackling that long driveway.

Flu-fighting tips

■ At home

Drink plenty of fluids

Drinking a sufficient amount of water every day helps you to stay hydrated and your system to stay clean. Drink when you're thirsty, and you can monitor your level of hydration by paying attention to the color of your urine. If it's almost clear, you're sufficiently hydrated. If it's a dark yellow, you need to drink more fluids.

■ In class

Cover your sneezes and coughs with your shoulder, not your hands

We all hate being bombarded with spit and germs when someone accidentally forgets to cover his or her mouth and nose when coughing or sneezing, but it's also a bad idea to cover your face with your hands. As soon as you touch something other than your face, you're spreading the virus and allowing many others to come into contact with it. Instead, cover your face with your shoulder and change your shirt as soon as possible.

■ At the gym

Clean machines thoroughly before and after use

If you have the flu, you shouldn't even be at the gym in the first place. However, some people can't stand to miss a workout, even when it's necessary. So, clean bars and machines before and after you use them, including the pins and clips you use to secure weights.

Check out the Centers for Disease Control Web site at www.cdc.gov/flu for more flu-fighting tips.

Staff Reports

FBC | K-State football

to host Signing Day 2007

The K-State football program and head coach Ron Prince will host Signing Day 2007 on Wednesday, Feb. 7, from 5 to 6:30 p.m. at the Clarion Hotel (formerly the Holiday Inn Holiday) in Manhattan, athletics department officials announced today.

The second annual event for K-State fans will be hosted by coach Prince, who will provide commentary on the Wildcats' 2007 recruiting class and answer questions regarding the class. There also will be a player-by-player review of the class featuring short video clips of each of the new Wildcats.

Tickets purchased for the event prior to Feb. 6 are priced at $10 for the general public and $5 for K-State students (with K-State I.D.). Any remaining tickets not purchased by Feb. 6 will be sold at the door on Feb. 7 for $15.

A complimentary selection of light hors d'oeuvres is included in the ticket price and a cash bar will be available throughout the evening.

Last year's inaugural event sold out well in advance of signing day, and athletics department officials encourage fans to pre-purchase tickets. Fans interested in ordering tickets for Signing Day 2007 may do so in person at the K-State Athletic Ticket Office in Bramlage Coliseum or by calling toll-free, (800) 221-CATS. The ticket office is open from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m., Monday through Friday.

TEN | Sharapova beats advances to semifinals

MELBOURNE, Australia — Maria Sharapova advanced to the Australian Open semifinals with a 7-6 (5), 7-5 win

Wednesday over Anna Chakvetadze, another 19-year-old Russian.

The top-seeded Sharapova, assured of gaining the No. 1 ranking next month, had trouble on her serve, getting broken twice in each set and having to fend off five break points.

She was broken when serving for the match at 5-3, giving up the break with a double fault and wasted a match point with a backhand error in the next game.

Sharapova got two more match points in the 12th game of the second set and finished it off in 2 hours, 14 minutes.

"It was very difficult. I didn't feel like we had a lot of easy rallies," Sharapova said. "I felt I had to work on every point."

She had 32 winners and 41 unforced errors, against 14 winners and 28 unforced errors for Chakvetadze.

"I was a little up and down, a bit scratchy," Sharapova said. "I am glad I got through, but next time will even be tougher."

Sharapova is into the semifinals at Melbourne Park for the third-straight year and is among the last four at a major for the eighth time. She is the defending U.S. Open champion and also won Wimbledon in 2004.

Chakvetadze, who had won 20 of her previous 21 matches, had never been beyond the fourth round of a major.

No. 4 Kim Clijsters and three-time champion Martina Hingis were to meet in a quarterfinal here for the second consecutive year.

Clijsters won at that stage last year, ending Hingis' remarkable run after coming to Melbourne Park with a ranking of 341 following three years in retirement.

In men's quarterfinals later Wednesday, second-seeded Rafael Nadal faced No. 10 Fernando Gonzalez of Chile, and Tommy Haas was against No. 3 Nikolay Davydenko.

On the other side of the draw, Andy Roddick was ruthless, treating his close friend like little more than warmup fodder for his semifinal showdown with Roger Federer.

The 2003 U.S. Open champion flattened Mardy Fish without blinking Tuesday, making only four unforced errors in a 6-2, 6-2, 6-2 quarterfinal win.

"I played pretty flawless, I thought," Roddick said. "I feel good going into the semis."

Federer, who lost to Roddick dropped his serve four times in a 6-3, 7-6 (2), 7-5 win over No. 7 Tommy Robredo.

"The break of serves, they're due to the wind I assume," Federer said.

This summer, athletes will be able to take the combat-ives course.

Next semester, it will be expanded to students who are not athletes or in the ROTC program.

"We're really excited to expand it to beyond the military," DeGroat said.

There will be four courses this summer for off-season athletes. Next semester there could be up to seven courses between the military and non-military, DeGroat said. This includes a women's self-defense class.

To make the program more accessible, they are making a new room for a combatives class.

DeGroat said the location of the room is not yet being released, but it will allow them to set their own hours for classes. Military uniforms will also be donated for the civilian classes.

In order to recruit for the program, DeGroat is learning moves along with the cadets.

He said he plans to go to fraternities and sororities next year to recruit for the class.

"You lead by example," he said. "I'm going through it so I can understand the best I can."

Two Manhattan bands play Auntie Mae's, win spots in summer festival

By Eric Brown
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While Sunday and Monday often are days for recovery after the weekend, Auntie Mae's Parlor was anything but a place of rest during the first two nights of this week.

On these nights, the underground music venue witnessed large crowds, music competition and two local bands winning a big opportunity.

Jan. 21 and 22 marked days 10 and 11 of the 2007 Wakarusa Winter Classic tour, bringing the hope to Manhattan for two local bands to play at this summer's Wakarusa Music and Camping Festival. Four bands competed each night for the prize, with the crowd voting one winner Sunday and another the next night.

Emerging as the first night's champion was Liars of Local Interest, a folk-rock, alternative-country quintet, while the Monday night win belonged to Canvas, a four-member, psychedelic, classic-rock jam-band.

"It still feels like a dream," said

Chris Hartmann, vocalist and lead guitar player for Canvas. "We went into this thing with no expectations of winning. We really just viewed this as a way of playing to a new crowd at the competition."

Josh Collinsworth, bass player for Liars of Local Interest said he, too, was surprised by his band's win.

"We knew we had no control over how voting would turn out," Collinsworth said. "We pretty much just left it up to ourselves to go out and have fun, and I guess it all came out to our advantage."

Previously having played shows at local bars, Liars of Local Interest and the Canvas will perform at a festival that sold more than 15,000 four-day passes last year.

"I think the biggest show we've played is about 75 people," Hartmann said. "But this isn't something that scares us. We enjoy playing to whoever wants to listen to our music. Whether it's four people or 40,000, it doesn't matter."

With such a large attendance at the festival, both bands view this as a way to broaden their fan base.

"The only way to really look at this is as an opportunity," Collinsworth said. "We'll have some CDs out by then and hopefully some people that check us out will like what we do. That's what this is all about."

The other bands competing on Sunday and Monday for Wakarusa stage time were the Ruckus, Barefoot Rebellion, the Groove Hustlers, the Violet Lights, That Damn Sasquatch, and 13th Step.

A Wakarusa committee selects bands from across the Midwest that submitted press kits to sonicbids.com.

The 2007 Wakarusa Winter Classic tour has been recruiting talent for this summer's festival since starting in Lincoln, Neb., on Jan. 12, and will end on Feb. 3 in St. Louis. The tour will stop in 19 different cities and hold competitions at 20 different venues.

Manhattan was one of only two cities where the tour made a two-night stop, and Auntie Mae's Parlor was the only venue to hold more than one competition.

"Wakarusa likes Manhattan," said John Barrett, production manager for the Wakarusa Winter Classic. "Manhattan and Auntie Mae's have supported Wakarusa in the past and continue to do so. There's also a strong music scene and a lot of support for the music in this town. It just made sense to do more than one show here."

After the stop in Manhattan, the tour will continue Thursday in Springfield, Mo., at the Outland.

The dates for this summer's Wakarusa Music Festival are June 7-10, at Clinton Lake, just outside of Lawrence. The festival features more than 70 bands playing on six stages.

This year's acts include Widespread Panic, Yonder Mountain String Band, North Mississippi Allstars, Tea Leaf Green and Alejandro Escovedo. Aside from music, the festival also includes disc golf, yoga, music workshops, a DJ tent, arts and crafts, mountain biking and hiking.

HOROSCOPES

Your weekly digest for Jan. 24 through Jan. 30

Aquarius

Your mate may be distressed if you refuse to make a commitment. Later in the week your boss will pat you on the back for a job well done. Sunday will be your lucky day.

Aries

Your charisma will no doubt attract a lot of attention. Quarrels will erupt if you get into philosophical debates. Try to keep your opinions to yourself. Tuesday will be your lucky day.

Cancer

You should feel a little more stable about your position; don't be surprised if a job offer comes your way. Make new friends by taking part in social events. Sunday will be your lucky day.

Capricorn

Take a look at yourself and make the changes you've been contemplating. If you work with someone else you may find they're trying to steal your thunder. Monday will be your lucky day.

Gemini

Look into joining groups that can give you hands-on advice. New romantic ties can be made, but you must make sure your motives are not selfish. Sunday will be your day.

Libra

Don't trust others with private information that could be used against you. Pleasure trips will be favorable and bring about possible romance. Sunday will be your lucky day.

Pisces

Your involvement with children will be most rewarding. Unexpected events may be upsetting. Help an older person with a problem that faces them. Saturday will be your lucky day.

Leo

You'll have amazing ideas, but superiors may try to block your attempts at implementing them. Don't try to hide your true feelings from your mate. Thursday will be your lucky day.

Scorpio

You will be emotional about family matters. Those close to you may be difficult to reason with. Go after your goals, and don't be afraid to ask for assistance. Saturday will be your lucky day.

Sagittarius

Be precise in your communications to avoid any misunderstandings and arguments. You could come into extra cash. Some of your new friends may not be that trustworthy. Sunday will be your lucky day.

Taurus

Added knowledge will give you the edge when dealing with peers. Someone you care about may let you down or criticize your methods. You have to believe in yourself and your talents. Sunday will be your lucky day.

Virgo

Put your efforts into making constructive improvements to your environment and your state of mind. Be aware of any deception on the part of those you deal with. Tuesday will be your lucky day.

Sophomore guard Shalee Lehning, the floor general for K-State's offense, is having an exceptional follow-up performance to her freshman season. She's averaging 7.7 points, 6.7 rebounds and 5.3 assists per game.

2007 RECRUITING CLASS

Get to know your future Wildcats

Beasley

Michael Beasley — 6-foot-9, 235-pound power forward
Notre Dame Prep School — Fitchburg, Mass.

After a 72-71 buzzer-beater victory over Dominique Sutton's The Patterson School, Notre Dame Prep moved to No. 2 in HoopsUSA.com's national prep school rankings.

Beasley is averaging a double-double, scoring 20 points and grabbing 13 rebounds per contest.

Chris Maza of the Fitchburg Sentinel & Enterprise contributed.

Brown

Fred Brown — 6-foot-3, 185-pound shooting guard
William T. Dwyer High School — West Palm Beach, Fla.

Brown's Dwyer High School had a rough week, going 1-2. Brown had 13 points Friday in only two quarters of action in a 57-39 victory over Boynton Beach.

"We had the game well in hand, so we rested (Brown)," Dwyer coach Fred Ross said.

The next day, the Panthers fell at Fort Myers 77-63. In the loss, Brown displayed his ability to shoot from long distance, hitting five 3-pointers on the way to 23 points.

Dwyer is now 13-6. Brown is averaging 19 points and 6.4 assists per game. He also leads the team in 3-pointers with a 43.2 (51-of-118) percentage.

Pullen

Jacob Pullen — 6-foot-11, 175-pound point guard
Proviso East High School — Maywood, Ill.

Proviso East demolished Addison Trail 83-37 on Saturday. No scorers or key players were mentioned in the article, and phone calls to the high school went unreturned. No other information is available at this time.

The Pirates are 15-3 this season and 6-0 in the West Suburban Gold Conference. They are No. 10 in the Chicago Sun-Times' latest poll.

The Chicago Sun-Times contributed.

Sutton

Dominique Sutton — 6-foot-4, 195-pound small forward
The Patterson School — Lenoir, N.C.

The Patterson School played one game last week, a 90-62 blowout of South Kent. Sutton had 15 points and eight rebounds in the win, which are right around his season averages.

The Bulldogs are 23-2 this season and ranked No. 3 in the nation, according to HoopsUSA.com's national prep school rankings.

"We have five guys scoring in double figures, so there's a lot of talent on this team," Patterson coach Chris Chaney said. "But (Sutton) is obviously one of our leaders."

Off the Court with Kimberly Dietz

Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kimberly Dietz is friendlier than she looks burning holes in the net. The junior from Boulder, Colo., has shot the rock from the top of the key since childhood. Fortunately for the Wildcats, Dietz chose to come to K-State after being heavily recruited by Colorado. It was a tough decision, but she said the players and coaches in Manhattan were the main factor in her choice. Dietz recently answered questions ranging from her favorite restaurant in Boulder to her special interests and hobbies.

Q. What was it like growing up in Boulder?
A. It was amazing. I love the mountains. I grew up in a skiing family, and (skiing) was one of the things we loved to do.

Q. Do your parents come to games?
A. Yeah, they live in Boulder still but try to come to as many games as they can, mostly the weekend games.

Q. Do you have siblings who play basketball?
A. I have two sisters, an older one and a younger one. The younger one still plays basketball, and she is really good.

Q. What is your favorite place to eat in Boulder?
A. Probably the Mediterranean. It's a seafood restaurant mostly and all the pasta is really good.

Q. What activities does the team do together outside of practice?
A. Most of the team lives in the dorms, so we hang out in each other's rooms and sometimes go to movies.

Q. Did you get recruited by Colorado?
A. Yes, definitely. It's right in my back door, so it was a hard decision to choose between K-State and Colorado.

Q. Why did you end up choosing K-State?
A. The teammates and the coaches, I loved them all. It just felt like home here.

Q. Do you have any hobbies or special interests?
A. I am a moving, outdoorsy person. I like to hike, snowboard and ski.

Big 12 Update

1. No. 6 Oklahoma — It seems the Sooners are well on their way to their second conference championship. With wins at Oklahoma State (76-60) and Colorado (82-67) last week, sophomore Courtney Paris continued to deliver dominating performances. In an 86-81 triple-overtime win over Texas Tech Monday, Paris nabbed her 45th-straight double-double with 22 points and 17 rebounds in the Sooners' 25th-straight conference victory. Oklahoma faces Iowa State at 7 tonight in Norman, Okla.

2. No. 25 Nebraska — Nebraska is off to its best start in Big 12 play since the 1996-97 season, earning wins against K-State (70-63) and at Missouri (76-66). Against K-State, junior Danielle Page had her second double-double with 11 points and 10 rebounds. Nine of those points were scored in the last seven minutes to help lead the Huskers to the win. Chelsea Aubry led the charge against the Tigers with a career-high 26 points. Nebraska travels to Lubbock, Texas, tonight to play Texas Tech.

3. No. 13 Baylor — Following a week-long break after a Jan. 13 loss at Texas A&M, the Bears bounced back with a 79-70 win against K-State Saturday. Bernice Mosby had 29 points and 10 rebounds and freshman Latara Darrett added 15 points and nine rebounds in her second career start. Baylor next faces the Longhorns in Austin, Texas, tonight at 7.

4. No. 21 Texas A&M — After a 74-58 win against Colorado on Jan. 18, the Aggies were upset 64-45 at Texas in the State Farm Lone Star Showdown Sunday. Junior A'Quonesia Franklin and sophomores Takia Starks and La Toya Micheaux each posted 13 points in the win over the Buffaloes. Starks led the effort against the Longhorns with 14 points, but Texas' tough defense proved too much.

5. No. 24 Texas — The Longhorns suffered a 67-56 loss at Iowa State but recovered to beat A&M at home 64-45. Redshirt freshman Carla Cortijo had 12 points and senior Tiffany Jackson added seven points and a game-high 11 rebounds against the Cyclones. Jackson led the charge against A&M with 27 points and 14 rebounds as the Longhorns were able to convert 23 Aggie turnovers into 26 points in the upset.

6. Iowa State — Senior Lyndsey Medders continues to lead the Cyclones. In a 67-56 upset over Texas Thursday, Medders had 23 points, five rebounds and six assists. At Kansas, Medders added 12 points and five assists to Toccara Ross' 16-point, 15-rebound performance in a 75-48 trouncing of the Jayhawks.

7. Texas Tech — The Lady Raiders had a good week, beginning with a 63-55 win over Missouri in which Chelsey Dabbs tied her season high with 20 points on 7-of-12 shooting. In a game that saw 12 lead changes, Raquel Christian and Patrice Edwards each scored 14 points against Oklahoma State, including a 15-foot jump shot from Christian with 1.1 seconds left that gave the Lady Raiders the 63-61 win.

8. K-State — Junior Kimberly Dietz and senior Claire Coggins led the Wildcats with 14 points apiece in the losing effort in Lincoln, Neb. Coggins again helped lead the charge against Baylor, as she and sophomore Shalee Lehning each had 20 points in the 79-70 loss. The Wildcats struggled on the road without the aid of sophomore Marlies Gipson, who was sidelined with a knee injury. K-State will tip off against Kansas tonight at 7 in Bramlage Coliseum.

9. Oklahoma State — Junior Maria Cordero had 15 points, senior Rashidat Sadiq had 12 and Kendra Moore had 11 points and a season-high four steals in the Bedlam loss to Oklahoma. The Cowgirls suffered from foul trouble early on against the Lady Raiders, and despite a game-high 15-point effort from freshman Andrea Riley, the Cowgirls were defeated practically at the buzzer. Oklahoma State faces Colorado tonight at 7 in Stillwater, Okla.

10. Colorado — The Buffaloes are struggling this season, with losses at Texas A&M (58-74) and to Oklahoma (67-82) — their third-straight conference defeat. Junior Jackie McFarland, the sister of former K-State player Jessica McFarland, had her 10th double-double of the season against A&M with 15 points and 13 rebounds. Against the Sooners, senior Jasmina Ilic had a season-high 29 points, and McFarland once again posted a double-double with 17 points and 14 rebounds.

11. Missouri — After a promising start in non-conference play, the Tigers have struggled, dropping their last five games, including losses to Texas Tech and Nebraska. Senior Eetisha Riddle had her third straight double-double against Tech with 12 points and 10 rebounds. Missouri once again couldn't overcome a large halftime deficit against the Huskers, despite double-digit performances from four players, including Riddle's 22.

12. Kansas — Kansas experienced a bright spot Jan. 17 with a 69-50 win against Sacramento State — the Jayhawks' first victory in seven games. The feeling was short-lived, as Kansas suffered a 75-48 loss to Iowa State on Saturday. Junior Shaquana Mosley scored a career-high 19 points in that game, but it did little to stem the effects of Kansas' 27.9 percent shooting performance from the field.

Freshmen standouts

Both the Wildcat and Jayhawk squads boast multiple high-caliber players with the potential for leadership

By Dayne Logan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is possible that eight freshmen will touch the floor in tonight's intra-state clash between K-State and Kansas.

Many of those freshmen already have enjoyed significant playing time this season, and have become key contributors to their respective teams.

Both Kari Kincaid and Ashley Sweat should get some minutes off the bench for K-State (14-3, 2-2 Big 12).

For Kansas (6-12, 0-5), Kelly Kohn and Porscha Weddington are likely to start, while Danielle McCray and Sade Morris should see some significant court time as well.

There also is a chance that Lindsay Ballweg and Rebecca Feickert will make an appearance for the Jayhawks.

Kohn (10.7 points per game) and McCray (8.2 ppg) are KU's top scorers this season, and are players that K-State coach Deb Patterson is quite familiar with.

"Both are making significant impact at KU and will continue to be very, very good Big 12 players," Patterson said.

Kincaid also familiar with a couple of the Kansas freshmen.

"I played with two of (KU's) freshmen, and they are great players and good friends of mine," said Kincaid, who played with McCray and Ballweg on an Amateur Athletic Union (AAU) basketball team.

Sweat was another member of the same AAU team.

"It'll be good to see them again. We're all pretty good friends," Sweat said.

The chance to play against her friends as a freshman was something Sweat said she did not think would happen.

"I didn't expect a lot of playing time. It's a great opportunity," said

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Freshman Ashley Sweat is averaging 9.1 points and 4.3 rebounds per game in 18 games and five starts this season. Sweat will face Kansas, who start two freshmen, tonight at 7.

Sweat, who is averaging just over nine points and 20 minutes per game this season.

Patterson said she is not at all surprised by the amount of playing time Sweat received so early in her K-State career.

"I certainly had hoped that we would get major minutes out of her because of (her) versatility," she said. "She should be one of our best defenders and should be one of our best rebounders with the size that she brings to the floor."

Patterson also complimented Sweat's ability to shoot 3-pointers and drive to the basket despite being one of the tallest players on the team.

Kincaid, who was injured at the beginning of the season and saw limited playing time as a result, was another player who received praise from her coach.

"When you're thrown into the frying pan this late, there's a lot to pick up," Patterson said. "As the season goes on, I think she'll be one of the best 3-point shooters out there."

Despite her lack of playing time, Kincaid said she has lofty goals for K-State, both this season and throughout her career.

"I want to get some Big 12 championships, make it to the NCAA tournament and just be consistent day in and day out," Kincaid said.

The Wildcats can take a step towards attaining all of those goals with a victory against the Jayhawks tonight.

Jason Bennett has been inconsistent at times in his freshman season offensively, though his defense has shown promise. Bennett has said his ultimate goal is to someday reach the NBA, but he'll have develop more of an all-around game.

Bennett needs time to realize potential

Tall people come down to normal height when they get hit in the stomach.

K-State freshman Jason Bennett — the 7-foot-3 center from Jacksonville, Fla. — has found that out the hard way in his first season of college basketball.

He's gotten knocked around at times by bigger, stronger players who have outmatched him physically.

That's led to some indifference amongst fans and has sparked debate about whether he's got what it takes to become an elite player. His defensive game has shined at times, but his offensive ability has come into question.

Through 20 games, skeptical K-State fans already have filed charges against Bennett, and the jury is still in deliberation. He's been charged with possession (of a basketball while having no apparent reason for holding it), loitering (inside the paint while not trying to establish low-post position) and identity theft (he's looked eerily similar to another center that's stepped onto the Bramlage Coliseum hardwood in recent years — Tyler Hughes).

In the face of these charges, Bennett has chosen to exercise his right to remain silent. OK, he's chosen to remain really silent.

Just take a look at the stat sheet. He's averaged 2.6 points and 3.4 rebounds per game and has seen limited action since losing his spot in the starting lineup last month.

So what gives? Why is Bennett not producing the way most fans had hoped he would? Why isn't he dunking basketballs off his tip-toes? Why isn't he playing much anymore?

"It's because of matchups," Bennett said. "Other teams were playing small so we put in smaller guys."

If that's the case, that doesn't speak well for Bennett. Why are other teams dictating his playing time? Shaquille O'Neal didn't ride the pine because opposing teams went small. Instead, he'd stay on the court and make them pay.

He'd score points, get rebounds and block shots. He'd make teams guard him, and if they did, he'd kick it out to his teammates and let them shoot open jumpers.

Is that to say I'm comparing Bennett to O'Neal, arguably the best 7-foot center to ever play? Of course not.

What I'm saying is Bennett doesn't have an all-around game that allows him to become a dominant presence on the floor — yet. He's not strong enough inside and hasn't developed his offensive game. Teams don't have to guard him. He's sort of a one-trick pony.

But let's remember something: he's a freshman.

Being seven feet tall guarantees nothing on a basketball court. The growth process is still the same as other players; you get better with hard work and experience.

The difference between Bennett and the majority of other K-State freshmen to come through the Wildcat program is the expectations placed upon him. Fans expected too much, too soon out of Bennett.

He won't become a great player overnight, and Bennett has to realize that and make sure he's not pressing. He's got to be focused on the present rather than worrying too much about the future.

"My No. 1 goal is to make it to the NBA," Bennett said. "I'd really like to make it to the NBA. I'm going to make it to the NBA."

If that's where he's set the bar, that's fine — I'm not a dream killer. But he's going to need to build a stronger résumé than the one he has now (and hope those pro teams don't go small).

Big 12 Update

1. No. 6 Texas A&M — Going from Colorado to Oklahoma State is a big change in talent level and the Aggies did it with ease, defeating the Cowboys 67-49. Senior Acie Law IV was steady, leading the Aggies with 16 points against Oklahoma State. With Law, junior Joseph Jones and several role-players, A&M is leading the Big 12 Conference with a 4-0 start.

2. No. 8 Kansas — After a 30-point blowout of Oklahoma State to start the Big 12 season, Kansas started to struggle. The Jayhawks beat Missouri by just three at home. Then they lost 69-64 to Texas Tech in Lubbock, Texas, Saturday. They are balanced, having four different players lead them in scoring the past four games. Despite struggling, they find themselves at 3-1 and tied for second in the Big 12.

3. Texas Tech — After sweeping the Kansas teams (K-State 62-52 on Jan. 8 and Kansas 69-64 on Saturday), the Red Raiders are 3-1 and tied for second in the Big 12. Their only loss in Big 12 play is, surprisingly, to Baylor. Senior Jarrius Jackson and junior Martin Zeno carry this team, as they are the only ones averaging double figures in points.

4. Texas — Kevin Durant might have scored just 12 points this past Saturday in a 76-69 loss to Villanova because it wasn't a Big 12 team. The star freshman averages 34 points per game in conference play. In the 105-103 triple overtime loss to Oklahoma State, Durant was dominant, scoring 37 and collecting 12 rebounds. Two of Texas' next three games are on the road and the young squad will be challenged after starting 3-1 in conference play.

5. No. 13 Oklahoma State — It has been a roller coaster ride for the Cowboys. They lost by 30 to Kansas, played a triple-overtime thriller in a victory over Texas and then lost to A&M. Senior Mario Boggan leads the team with 21.4 points and 8.1 rebounds per game and showed why he might be up for the Big 12 Conference Player of the Year with a 37-point, 20-rebound performance against Texas.

6. K-State — After digging an 0-2 hole at the beginning of conference play, the Wildcats have won three straight, including wins last week against Baylor and Iowa State. Senior Cartier Martin and junior David Hoskins have led the way. Senior Lance Harris provided an extra boost by scoring in double figures the past three games. Junior Clint Stewart provides an answer at point guard as long as he stays out of foul trouble. The Wildcats' next two Big 12 match-ups will be at home.

7. Oklahoma — It looks as if the Sooners are hitting their stride in the middle of conference play after beating Nebraska by 17 and Baylor by 40. Junior Longar Longar is back from his two-game suspension to boost their inside game with his team-leading 11.9 points per game. Playing in the South division doesn't help the Sooners, but a 3-2 start is a good one for coach Jeff Capel's squad.

8. Iowa State — After starting conference play hot with two straight victories, the Cyclones have stopped spinning with three straight losses. Junior Mike Taylor has been a good scorer with 16.7 per game, but the team has not been consistent. After the surprisingly close loss to Kansas, Iowa State went to Colorado and lost, then was physically dominated by K-State at home.

9. Nebraska — Junior Aleks Maric had a superb performance in a 71-50 win over Colorado with 28 points and eight rebounds. Through three games in conference play, Doc Sadler's team sits at 1-2 with the recent loss to Oklahoma. The Huskers will run into trouble if the competition has a player who can shut down Maric.

10. Baylor — After the surprising 73-70 win over Texas Tech, the Bears haven't been able to shoot the ball very well. They shot 34 percent in a loss to K-State and followed that performance with 30-percent night in a loss to Oklahoma. Star sophomore Kevin Rogers, who is averaging 12.4 points per game, scored only six points combined in the losses to K-State and Oklahoma. The Bears have a tough road ahead with Kansas and Texas waiting.

11. Colorado — Colorado got a conference win against Iowa State Jan. 17, but quickly was grounded with a 21-point loss to Nebraska. Junior Richard Roby will cause problems for teams, but no one else on the team should be hard to stop. Starting 1-4 in the Big 12 is good for second to last in conference and don't expect the Buffaloes to climb out of the cellar with Missouri and Kansas coming up.

12. Missouri — The surprise of the Big 12 season is the Tigers having yet to win a conference game. The Tigers had the week off to regroup and prepare for Colorado. Missouri's three-point loss at Kansas showed promise for Tiger fans. Junior Steffon Hannah is averaging 13.5 points and 3.8 assists per game in Big 12 play, which is a drop from his season averages of 15.4 points and 4.8 assists.

Sweat to lead team soon

Ashley Sweat might not be a household name just yet, but watch out, because she will be soon.

The freshman forward has been a solid contributor during the 2006-07 season, and she has shown flashes of superb play in her first year as a Wildcat.

Sweat is tied with junior Shana Wheeler and sophomore Danielle Zanotti as the tallest players on the team at 6-foot-2-inches, and she knows how to use her height.

Her size, quickness and ball-handling skills have allowed her to become a factor in the paint.

She is fourth on the team in scoring and rebounding with 9.1 points and 4.3 rebounds per game. She is third in blocks with 15 while playing an average of 20.7 minutes per game.

Sweat also has the versatility and all-around game that makes her more than just a low-post presence.

She can shoot outside jump shots, and her skills stretch all the way to the 3-point line.

She is hitting 43 percent of her field-goal attempts, and 40 percent of her shots behind the arc.

She has knocked down 12 three's this season, which are third on the team.

Not many people, including herself and coach Deb Patterson, expected her to see much playing time this early in her career, but she is making the most of her opportunity.

Sweat has already scored in double figures in 10 games, including six of her last eight.

She has also had a couple of stellar performances this season during her maturation process into the Wildcat program.

In her first collegiate game — a 72-67 victory against UW-Green Bay Nov. 10 — she not only started, but scored 10 points and was second on the team with eight rebounds. She led the team with two blocked shots in 26 minutes of action.

She started the first five games of her career, but hasn't started since. There's no reason to look too much into that, though, because she is a more effective player coming off the bench at this stage in her career. Senior Cartier Martin comes off the bench for the men's team, and he is doing quite well.

In her most recent action — a 79-70 loss at Baylor — she put up 10 points and grabbed a team-high seven rebounds in 28 minutes.

Sweat's next chance to showcase her talents will be tonight when K-State (14-4 overall, 2-3 Big 12 Conference) takes on intrastate rival Kansas at 7 in Bramlage Coliseum.

Wildcat fans will get a chance to see how she performs in her first Sunflower Showdown against the Jayhawks (6-12, 0-5), and I bet she won't disappoint.

She gets numerous accolades from her coach and teammates because of her stellar work ethic and ability on the floor, and she has all the tools to become a dominant player in the future for the Wildcats.

Women's 5 Keys to Victory

Wildcats should remain confident against weaker Jayhawk team

By Dayne Logan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

1. LET 'EM SHOOT

Kansas has been terrible from 3-point range this season, shooting just 31 percent. The Wildcats need to overload the paint and force the Jayhawks to take the outside shot.

2. EXPLOIT FRESHMEN MISTAKES

Kansas starts two freshmen in Kelly Kohn and Porsche Weddington and both KU and Iowa State use several freshmen off the bench.

K-State needs to attempt to isolate these young players on the offensive end to see if their defense is up to Big 12 Conference standards. If not, the Wildcats could collect some easy points.

3. GET IT TO LEHNING

Sophomore Shalee Lehning has had the hot hand lately, shooting better than 60 percent from the field in the last three games combined, including a career-high 20 points against Baylor. If the Wildcats need points in a hurry, she is one of the best options.

4. STAY CONFIDENT

Two tough road losses in a row can be demoralizing for a team. The Wildcats need to remember why they were ranked No. 25 just last week and pick up wins against two teams they are very capable of beating.

5. REDEFINE DEFENSE

After holding Texas A&M to 45 points two weeks ago, K-State has conceded 65 points or more in each of its last three games. If Kansas scores 65, things are going to get worse for the Wildcats.

Men's 5 Keys to Victory

Post players, Hoskins important in match-up with Cornhuskers

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

1. MANAGE HUSKER CENTER

Nebraska center Aleks Maric leads the Big 12 Conference in shooting percentage (63.6 percent) and averages better than 18 points per game.

K-State needs to keep Maric from getting easy baskets and make him work on defense. Nebraska doesn't have much front-court depth, so K-State should go after Maric and try to get him in foul trouble.

2. USE HOSKINS' HOT HAND

Junior David Hoskins has reached double figures in 12 straight games and will try to keep the streak going against Nebraska.

Hoskins, who scored 22 Saturday at Iowa State, has a knack for creating shots and drawing fouls in the paint, and that's exactly what K-State's offense needs.

3. LEARN FROM LAST YEAR

Last season's home loss against Nebraska was a complete embarrassment for K-State.

K-State scored 42 points and shot just 23 percent from the field. That loss should stay with the Wildcats and remind them what can happen if they come out flat.

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

Junior David Hoskins has recorded two consecutive double doubles, and will be a huge factor when Nebraska comes to Manhattan Saturday.

4. SEE BIG PLAYS FROM BIG MEN

Maric's strong post presence likely means more minutes for K-State's big men Jason Bennett and Luis Colon.

Those two need to play solid defense and contribute a few baskets on offense. Bennett can energize the crowd with his monster blocks, but he also needs to be a factor as a rebounder.

5. FILL THE 'VILLE

Huggieville should be packed for this crucial conference game. The Wildcats already have dropped a conference game on their home floor against Texas Tech Jan. 8, and you can bet they don't want to lose another. A loud, raucous home crowd will be a tremendous asset against Nebraska and throughout the rest of the conference schedule.

Web sites encourage eating disorders, prevent treatment

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Several pro-eating disorder Web sites encourage, rather than discourage, unhealthy eating habits. Some even provide tips on how to continue such practices.

Lynn Grefe, chief executive officer of the National Eating Disorders Association, defined pro-anorexia sites as sites that support and encourage people to restrict their food and continue their anorexic tendencies.

"It's a support system," she said. "We consider it a severely negative and dangerous, almost cult-like Web site for people who are suffering from anorexia."

According to a recent study from the Stanford University School of Medicine and Lucile Packard Children's Hospital, eating disorder patients that had visited pro-eating disorder Web sites tended to have the condition longer and learned new methods to lose weight and purge.

Grefe said the Web sites are dangerous because people with eating disorders go to them for help to work through their problems.

"They're harmful because they're keeping people out of treatments, and their whole attitude is saying that it's OK — that anorexia is a lifestyle choice and that you have a right to be anorexic," she said. "It's not a lifestyle choice. It's in fact a mental illness that is treatable, and we hope people will recover."

According to a poll conducted by the National Eating Disorders Association in Sept. 2006, 20 percent of college students on campuses across the nation said they believed they suffered from an

Outgoing Saudi Ambassador to give year's first Landon Lecture

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The outgoing ambassador of Saudi Arabia to the United States will present the first 2007 Landon Lecture Friday.

Appointed ambassador on July 20, 2005, Prince Turki al-Faisal is the 147th lecturer in the lecture series' 40-year history. Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture series, said he invited Prince Turki to give the lecture after he gave a speech during International Week in April 2006.

From 1977-2001, Prince Turki served as director general of the General Intelligence Directorate, which is the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia's main foreign intelligence service. He is the brother of Prince Saud al-Faisal and son of the late King Faisal.

In August 2002, Prince Turki and two other Saudi princes were sued for allegedly helping finance the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, according to www.globalsecurity.org. One month later, he commented in Arab News Newspaper that "Saudi Arabia has worked with the United States for the past 70 years. Both countries have benefited from this enduring partnership. Remember that we face the same threat: Bin Ladin targeted Saudi Arabia before he targeted America."

More than 100 Saudi Arabian students from K-State, Saudi students from other Kansas universities and leaders of Saudi student associations in surrounding states are expected to Local woman reports car stolen after her arrest

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan woman reported her car stolen after she was arrested on probation violation charges, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department said.

Tonya Marie Moffett, 2115 Elm Lane Apt. B., was arrested Tuesday by Riley County Police. After her arrest, she reported her 1995 Oldsmobile Cutlass Supreme had been taken from the parking lot at Kmart Stores, 401 E. Poyntz Ave.

A person known to her took the car between 11:30 a.m. and 4 p.m. Tuesday, Quintanar said.

Police arrested Moffett at 1922 Pierre St. She reported the car missing at the time of her arrest.

"At that time we took the report as well," Quintanar said.

New passport law limits border territory travel

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Travelers planning on flying to Mexico, Canada or Bermuda any time soon now need to show a valid passport.

As of Tuesday, citizens of the United States, Canada, Mexico and Bermuda are required to present a passport to enter the United States when arriving via air from any part of the Western Hemisphere, according to a U.S. Department of State and Homeland Security release.

"The goal is to strengthen border security and facilitate entry into the United States for U.S. citizens and legitimate foreign visitors by providing standardized, secure and reliable documentation which will allow the Department of Homeland Security to quickly, reliably and accurately identify a traveler," according to the release.

The 9/11 Commission made this change in required traveling documents, which Congress subsequently passed into law in the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004, the department stated.

"In order to obtain national security benefits as quickly as possible and to expedite the processing of arriving passengers, the plan will be implemented in two phases," according to the release.

The first phase involves travel by air. The second phase involves travel by sea, land and ferry.

Traveling to or returning directly from Guam, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Swains Island and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands is allowed without a passport because those are U.S. territories, the department stated.

Cheryl McKinnon, postmaster for the Manhattan post office, said she already has seen an increase of students coming in to get passports.

"We do expect an increase with spring break coming up," she said.

Students will need to fill out an application for a passport, which is processed and sent to Houston, she said. McKinnon said a passport without a picture costs $97 and a passport with a picture is $112.

Students can apply for passports at the U.S. Postal Service office at 500 Leavenworth St.

Jennifer Smith, interim director for K-State's study abroad program, said the changes will not affect students studying abroad because they already were advised to obtain passports.

Smith said for study-abroad students to receive basic services, such as bank transactions, in Mexico or any other country affected by the new law, they must have a valid passport.

Melissa Adams, coordinator for the dean of human ecology, said she and her fiancé, Joel Pearson, a K-State graduate, have traveled to and from Cuernavaca, Mexico, a few times since last year.

"The new law was not in effect when we went, but they made sure that we knew we would need one by January," Adams said.

Adams said she feels more secure now Congress passed this law.

"I think it is necessary," she said. "It makes me more secure to know that anyone can't just come in and out of U.S., and we can't just go in and out of any other country. It ensures our safety as well as theirs."

Why do you go to Aggieville?

By Stephanie Gorges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's Thursday night and you're ready for a night on the town. But before you go, find out what your clothes, companions and behavior reveal about your true Aggieville intentions.

- 1. It's 20 degrees outside, and you're walking to the bars. What are you wearing?
- a. Jeans and a nice top with my super-stylin' scarf and hat set. (2 points)
b. Jeans and a sweatshirt. My clothes will probably get dirty anyway. (1 point)
c. Practically nothing. (3 points)

- 2. What do you bring with you to Aggieville?
- a. Definitely not my keys — I'm not driving home. (1 point)
b. My digital camera. (2 points)
c. Condoms. (3 points)

- 3. What's your favorite Aggieville bar?
- a. Tubby's — bring on the dance floor! (3 points)
b. Rusty's — food, music and a good crowd. (2 points)
c. Whoever's got the best drink specials. (1 point)

4. Your favorite drink is...

- a. Beer (1 point)
b. Sex on the beach (3 points)
c. Amaretto sour (2 points)

5. With whom do you go to Aggieville?

- a. A group of friends (2 points)
b. It doesn't matter who I go with — it's about who I leave with. (3 points)
c. My drinkin' buddies (1 point)

6. At the end of the night, you'll be...

- a. Taking off your clothes. (3 points)
b. Intoxicated. (1 point)
c. At Pita Pit or Daylight Donuts grabbing a midnight snack. (2 points)

7. What will you be thinking tomorrow morning?

- a. "Uh... who is this guy/girl in my bed?" (3 points)
b. "Last night was a blast! I can't wait to go out again." (2 points)
c. "I'm so hung over. I'm never drinking again." (1 point)

Illustration by Donnie Lee

7-10 points:
Drinking. You go to Aggieville for one thing: alcohol. Enjoy the "Animal House" lifestyle while you can, but try not to sleep through your classes tomorrow morning.

11-17 points:
Having fun. For you, Aggieville is all about escaping the stress of your homework, your job and your roommates for an evening. Rather than drink yourself stupid, you find enjoyment watching the members of Group A embarrass themselves.

18-21 points:
Hooking up. You're on the prowl, and you're not taking no for an answer. Just remember — what sounds like a good idea after a few brewskies might not seem so brilliant in the morning.

'Free 4 All' showcases student services

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Mortar Board Honor Society hosted the first-ever "Free 4 All," a student services fair, Wednesday afternoon in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

More than 10 student services were represented during the lunch hour.

Sheena Nagaraja, senior in biology and pre-optometry, said she had the idea to organize the event when she and other members of the Mortar Board leadership committee were discussed free campus services for K-State students.

"We realized that we were seniors and still weren't aware of some of the free services offered," Nagaraja said. "Our committee really just wanted to get the word out to students that there are so many free opportunities available."

As the lower level of the Union hummed with conversation, students walked around the different booths collecting brochures and talking with delegates.

Marian Brandenburg, administrative specialist for K-State Recreational Services, said she she was thankful for the publicity.

"The (Peters Recreation Complex staff) just wants to let the students know about all of the fun and free services we offer," Brandenburg said. "With your student ID, you can take group fitness courses, use our exercise machines, play intramurals and much more."

David Griffin Jr., junior in print journalism, said he heard about the event through his fraternity, Alpha Phi Alpha.

"I thought it was a great idea to host this here in the Union during the lunch hour when students have some free time to take a look at all the booths," Griffin said. "It was also interesting to see how all of our organizations can come together to help promote each other for no profit."

As "Free 4 All" came to a close, representatives took down posters and passed out the last of their fliers.

All of the representatives said they agreed the event was a success and should be continued through the next several years.

"I hope to see this continued every semester at K-State," Brandenburg said. "It's definitely a positive thing for everyone."

On-ramp confusion causes damage to depot

By Dustin Sanborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An accidental sort of demolition derby has been causing damage to the old train depot in downtown Manhattan.

Eddie Eastes, city parks superintendent, said drivers frequently turn off Tuttle Creek Boulevard to get to what they think is Kansas Highway 177. Only to find they turned a few yards too early.

Eastes said people pull in through the depot parking lot, try to turn around, and damage the landscaping.

"The most common damage incurred around the depot is done to the shrubs, landscaping and irrigation system for the depot," he said.

Eastes said one driver managed to run into the stairwell and knock over some brick.

"Thousands of dollars in damages have been incurred by the motorists," he said.

Eastes said the signs pointing the way to K-177 were moved to help lessen the confusion. Signs also were added that say, "No outlet, not K-177."

Others have brought up ideas to deter motorists from entering the depot by mistake.

"Adding security cameras or a fence around the depot has been discussed to prevent further damage," said Bonnie Lynn-Sherow, member of the Riley County Preservation Alliance board.

Lynn-Sherow said the depot was constructed in 1901. She said there was a rally for Theodore Roosevelt's visit there in 1903, and soldiers traveled in and out of Manhattan via trains that passed through the depot during World War I, World War II and the Vietnam War.

A storm caused the tower atop the depot to fall in the 1930s, Lynn-Sherow said, and the tower's remnants were removed.

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

The Union Pacific Historic Train Depot is where Tuttle Creek Boulevard turns into Fort Riley Blvd.

Travelers, including countless K-State students, used the depot for passenger service until 1976.

Union Pacific stopped using the depot for freight service in the 1980s, Lynn-Sherow said.

Today, the remodeled depot is used for banquets, wedding receptions and other events.

Bookstore owners say textbook lists hard to manage

By Ben Hedges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Time and time again, students and parents have directed the same question toward Varney's and the K-State Student Union Bookstore.

Why there is no list of textbooks available to student before the semester begins?

With a list, students could take advantage of knowing what textbooks are needed and find books at a discounted price, either online or at other businesses.

Dan Walter, textbook manager at Varney's, said a master list of every textbook for every class takes a lot of effort to create and is far too unstable to be helpful to students.

"The information that's available in general, by law, is the raw information that we get from instructors," Walter said. "If you wanted to get that raw information, we could work out a system for you to get that, but I could in no way guarantee that would be the book you needed for class."

Many instructors place orders for their textbooks up to six months in advance, potentially causing students to purchase the wrong book.

Walter said instructors could change their mind about a book, switch class sections or cancel the class altogether, leaving students with books they could be unable to refund if they shopped for them weeks in advance.

"The reality of it is it costs a lot of money and a lot of time and expertise to find out what the real book is for the class," Walter said.

Steve Levin, manager of the Union bookstore, said it makes no sense to do extra work for other businesses, when they themselves can step up to find out what books students need for their classes.

"I don't think it's fair to the vast majority of students," Levin said.

"Instead of working to find as many used books and trying to buy back students' books, we would be in charge of making this master list that the Internet providers wouldn't check, and if it changed, they wouldn't change theirs, and students would end up with bad information."

Levin said it is a student's right to shop around for textbooks, but he also said the bookstores want to continue to put their effort into getting the right books for every student.

The possibility of some kind of list is not out of the picture, however.

Josh Hersh, vice chair of the Student Governing Association's university relations committee, said there have been talks of an online database for textbook information since last fall.

"This information is something that students should have access to," Hersh said.

Hersh said he purchased his textbooks online, and said other students should take advantage of it too.

Walter said a more stable and inexpensive textbook system comes with better communication between instructors and the bookstores. He said he has worked with student, faculty and administration representatives in past semesters to help pressure instructors to get their textbook lists in quicker.

However, he assures that creating a single list for students to access is impractical.

"Hardly any universities publish a list," Walter said. "And if they do, I'd like to see what they do when instructors change books."

TO THE POINT Professors should provide book lists

Students need an online list where they can find the books they need to start off on the right academic foot before the start of each semester.

To provide students with an effective online list, professors need to take a more proactive approach.

There's a myth that professors hand a sort of "master list" over to Varney's Bookstore every semester.

The truth is, Varney's spends a lot of time calling the instructors of each course to find out what books they plan to use.

It wouldn't make sense for Varney's to release that list to competitors, especially when they're the ones doing all the leg work.

Also, the list constantly changes because new books are published or the professors changes their minds.

This mean students might end up purchasing a book they won't need, causing the bookstore to look responsible.

Professors often bash Varney's for high prices, or request a book and then once class starts tell their students they won't need it. In reality, the professors are part of the problem. Instead of complaining about Varney's, professors should be proactive.

Instructors need a place online where they can post what books they require and then update the list when they change the curriculum.

The Collegian would like to help create an online list where professors can update what books they need.

Post suggestions for such a list to the comment section of this article online at www.kstatecollegian.com and keep checking for further updates.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Round and round they go

Pointless bickering between celebrities shouldn't qualify as news

"Blaming guns for killing people is like Rosie O'Donnell blaming her fork because she's fat." I read this bumper sticker to myself and had a nice, long chuckle.

Unless you've been living under a rock, you have heard much debate between Rosie O'Donnell and her arch-nemesis, Donald Trump. Because Trump stuck his neck out for a young woman who got intoxicated, O'Donnell pegged him as a selfish, greedy womanizer.

Trump lashed back, calling her a fat pig.

O'Donnell accused Trump of wasting his inheritance.

Trump sued O'Donnell.

This is what I like to refer to as the Circle of Life.

These two have gone back and forth, and there is no sign of stopping on either side.

In all fairness, I must side with Trump. Throughout this whole ridiculous conflict, Trump never did anything that rubbed me the wrong way. Sure, he gave an underage alcoholic a second chance, but shouldn't we all get second chances? In reality, not everyone gets another shot at life, but that does not mean Trump deserves to be chastised for his decision.

Don't get me wrong though – Trump cannot justify his actions toward O'Donnell. He's just more entertaining.

According to a statement from O'Donnell, Trump is a "snake-oil salesman." She also accused Trump of bankruptcy, then said he only made it big because of the money he inherited upon his father's death.

This obviously did not please the Trumpster. On "Entertainment Tonight," Trump said he was going to take money out of O'Donnell's "fat pocket." What Trump meant was he wanted to sue O'Donnell for making false statements, i.e. accusing him of going bankrupt.

You might be thinking to yourself, "Who cares? This isn't the first time two people have bickered."

Guess what? You are exactly right. Who cares about these two overblown celebrities?

O'Donnell is a loudmouth ignoramus who feels the only way she can prove a point is to scream at someone. Trump is a bloated gazillionaire who likes to throw his money around for no reason. It makes no sense that he would sue O'Donnell – what charges would she face, other than hurting Trump's feelings in the third degree?

Yet, this is all news outlets have covered for the past few weeks.

Is there nothing else going on in the world?

I thought we were fighting a war overseas. I thought we were getting ready to examine presidential candidates for 2008.

Those things apparently are not all that important. They can wait a week or two so the media can cover the monotonous duel between Trump and O'Donnell.

Ah, who am I kidding? I love watching Trump call O'Donnell a fat pig.

Address fuel problems while gas still is cheap

With gas prices down, and down, and down again, the frolicking and dancing at gas stations is well understood.

But even in my own joyous world, well divorced from reality, I understand lulls in price are only temporary reprieves from a steady climb. It would be "good doings" if we were to seize the cheap while we can and start making other arrangements.

Don't get me wrong, I enjoy motoring about as much as anyone.

Cruising in my pimp whip of drag racing and babe magnetry fame (also known as my rusty '97 Sentra) provides seclusion to sing along to obscure music or shout vulgarities at Rush Limbaugh.

But the realization that there are now lots more people now merrily puttering about rears the ugly fact of almost unlimited goers, with limited go-juice left in the ground.

No one living above ground takes seriously the predictions that next Wednesday the world will run out of oil.

But we don't need to be economists to realize there is a limit to how much oil can be produced per day, with more people every day wanting more oil.

The obvious answer is an increase in prices as demand increases and supply does not – duh.

This means at some point gas will rise above two and then three bucks a gallon and not return, and the days of a full tank for two green Lincolns will have been relegated to the bin with quarter movies and penny candy.

When it comes to ethanol and bio-diesel, Kansans, being well situated to make money, seem to thrill at the idea.

The concept sounds pretty – a sort of Mr. Fusion from "Back To

The Future" running off banana peels, old pizza and beer bottles.

Our own president finds the ideas at least worth mentioning, as we got at least half an earful about them during the State of the Union address. Unfortunately, we're still oblivious on how to produce all our neat garbo-fuels without using a mess of black-gold in the process.

I could tell you most European nations would catch fire in sheer ecstasy at having our low gas prices, but this factoid has been weathered, flogged and paraded so much its corpse has earned a place in the cliché hall of fame.

But in Europe, you are not limited to driving. Even when new areas are built, they are constructed as if made for people instead of Daimler-Chrysler.

In the Frankensteinian castle where Manhattan's architects sew together a city plan from bits of rot and mildew hewn cold from other failed designs, we wonder if they realize people are not delivered from the womb pre-wheeled.

With the myriad of new construction perpetually lurching out of the ground, it is not infeasible that someone, somewhere might think sidewalks and bike-paths would be a healthy addition.

Mayor Bruce Snead certainly talks as if he understands this. I enjoy talk, and think everyone should try some from time to time, but we can't ignore the large chasm of difference between talk and action. We have talk – loads of it – but we curiously are lacking in action.

We have the resources to make our cities not entirely car-dependent, and making these changes while fuel is cheap will be an entirely less painful process than waiting until we're getting choked at the pump.

Pharmacists out of line in refusing to provide customers with Plan B

By Martina Fetzer
THE DAILY ATHENAEUM

Last week, Tashina Byrd, a Columbus, W.Va., woman, and her boyfriend went to their local Wal-Mart pharmacy to pick up Plan B emergency contraceptive pills.

These pills do not require a prescription for women 18 and older, but the pharmacist reportedly shook his head at the woman and denied her the pills, saying, "I do not believe in ending life, and life begins at conception."

Putting aside the fact the pharmacist obviously doesn't understand what the morning-after pill does (it only works before conception), it is not his place to refuse drugs to anyone unless the drugs pose a significant risk to that person.

And no, being left behind after the rapture doesn't count as a significant risk.

Imagine for a moment that I took a job as a cashier at Wal-Mart and refused to scan items through the register because I don't believe the Chinese slave labor behind the production of Wal-Mart's everyday-low-priced garbage is moral. I would last mere seconds before being fired on the spot.

It is not an employee's job to preach.

If someone is a vegetarian, he or she can't take a job at KFC and then refuse to touch the chicken – so why should pharmacists get paid for refusing to do their jobs?

A pharmacist's job is to dole out prescriptions and make sure none of them conflict with another.

That's it. Plan B isn't even a prescription drug, so the pharmacist's job is to hand it over to anyone 18 or older.

As soon as Byrd showed identification to the pharmacist, she should have been given the drug – no questions asked.

One person's religious beliefs should not trump another's health and well-being.

In the issue of a woman wishing to prevent pregnancy, it isn't even OK for a pharmacist to tell a woman to go to another pharmacy.

Every minute spent traveling around town is another minute the woman could become pregnant and saddled with the physical, emotional and monetary costs of either having an abortion or going through childbirth.

Of course, the pharmacists in objection aren't the ones who'll have to deal with this, so they don't care.

In many areas, there is only one pharmacy, so this is akin to forcing a woman to do nothing to prevent pregnancy. I'm aware the morning-after pill is a last resort, but, sadly, it is all that some women have.

The entire country would be up in arms if a pharmacist kept lecturing a woman about how irresponsible it is to have children and coerced her into getting Plan B.

For some reason, though, this situation doesn't provoke nearly as much outrage in reverse.

These pharmacists make it look as though pregnancy is a woman's natural state and anything else is unholy.

There's a part of me that would love to see a female pharmacist tell a man his erectile dysfunction was "meant to be" and, refuse him his Viagra, but even if that ever happened, I would be extremely aggravated.

Editorial board missed the 'point' in advocating blind faith

Editor,

In the To the Point column, "Trust Bush's decision, trust troops," the Collegian staff showed how out of touch with reality they really are.

Relying on the media to get the information right is lazy and dangerous. I did tours in Afghanistan and Iraq and found that much of the information reported to the American public was just plain wrong.

If you want to get the real stories, try embedding yourselves with American forces instead of regurgitating information from your comfortable offices in Kedzie Hall.

You said you rely on others to have your best interests in mind. Too bad the President doesn't feel the same way.

The Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel, offered 79 recommendations for change to the Iraq strategy.

Your assertion that troops

"trust Bush with their lives" couldn't be more wrong.

We trust our brothers and sisters in arms with our lives, not some politician who is — at most — risking his or her political career.

Soldiers don't have the luxury of choosing where they fight, but we do have the right to disagree with policy decisions that so obviously are flawed.

You don't make your neighborhood safer by fighting crime in another city, and you don't make our country safer by fighting terrorism overseas.

Use the manpower and financial resources to make things better at home.

If you want to experience your first lesson in combat-ives, go up to a soldier, past or present, and tell him or her to stop whining.

Justin Heldenbrand
SENIOR IN SOCIAL SCIENCES

Editor,

In their Jan. 24 editorial "Trust Bush's decision, trust troops," the K-State Collegian Editorial Board showed us what happened to the children who were "left behind."

Although I disagree with the continuing Iraq War and the proposed escalation, I was appalled by the editorial board's flippancy and fundamental lack of understanding about our democracy.

It is our duty as citizens in a participative democracy to stay informed, ask questions and challenge our leaders. We use this information to vote and make our voices heard with free speech.

Einstein said, "Unthinking respect for authority is the greatest enemy of truth." The editorial board's statement "let the system work, and stop whining (sic)" is a contradiction when the system is a democracy.

The opposition to the Iraq War and its escalation is a bi-partisan movement including elected officials, much of the country and several "military geniuses" that are not willing to be fooled again.

To the editorial board, somewhere along the line your public education has failed you. I suggest you read the Constitution and take a few basic civics courses to acquaint yourselves with our democracy and your roles as journalists.

It is your right to have whatever opinion you want, but please endeavor to engage in thoughtful, intelligent debate and save blind faith for religion. Better yet, avoid faith altogether and question everything.

Female athletes need Title IX

Editor,

I am a former member of the K-State equestrian team and I absolutely support Title IX. I recognize that without Title IX there would be no women's sports.

As mentioned in your Jan. 23 article, the women's teams here at K-State do not bring any money to the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, so without Title IX, why would K-State keep women's sports around at all?

As for Liz Adams, if varsity soccer was so important, then why did she come to K-State?

There are options other than K-State if you want to play varsity soccer, softball or whatever. This year's equestrian team is represented by 13 states (including Maryland and Alaska) because riding on a varsity team was a priority.

I, too, came to K-State to ride horses even though I am not a native of the state.

You should be careful when you are writing about the success of the equestrian team. At the Intercollegiate Horse Show Association National Show last year, the Western Squad was reserve champion, which means they came in second in the nation. What other varsity sport on campus has been second in the nation?

The English Squad was 10th in the nation overall, which is a great accomplishment seeing as more than 340 schools participate in the IHSA.

I can list numerous girls who placed at Nationals last year, but there also were National Champions and Reserve Champions.

That is a pretty big deal no matter what sport you're involved in.

Columnist should pay attention to voting, not business deals

Editor,

Mr. King is right to question Hillary Clinton's abilities, but his reasoning is all wrong.

No mention is made of her centrist, "please everyone all the time" political stance.

Her husband also was painfully centrist, and it seems to me this shared political attitude is more worthy of discussion than their shared last name.

Also, what about her failure to take a stand against the war in Iraq until after even Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., began to question it?

I'm reminded of another Democratic senator who voted in favor of the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution but quickly became the leading critic of the Vietnam War.

Hillary Clinton, however, completely lacks whatever foresight former Sen. George McGovern, D-S.D., had.

This lack of vision seems to be a worthier topic and a bigger impediment to good leadership than confusion over what type of people make up the middle class.

Pointing a finger at a senator's shady business deals seems redundant and probably accomplishes nothing.

Call it cynicism if you must, but I suspect most politicians of being snakes, not just the ones I disagree with.

Let's shift our focus away from their nature and towards their voting records and political stance.

Non-native speakers should practice English skills on campus

Editor,

Learning English as a second language is not easy. It becomes more difficult when the only time you speak English is when you absolutely have to, like when talking to native speakers. International students often are heard speaking their own language on campus.

If you have a near-native command of English, keeping your hand in in your own language is a nice idea, but this doesn't help those who are trying to achieve fluency.

International students, especially graduate teaching assistants, seem like they try to avoid speaking English.

Being proud of their own language and content with their working knowledge of English, they seem reluctant to improve their English further.

This must be why they always speak their own language when talking to their countrymen.

These people need to realize what they are missing out on. If you are at K-State, you have the opportunity to learn it straight from the horse's mouth.

Why not do it?

Fans need to show support

Editor,

Wildcat fans, it's your turn. You wanted a winning basketball team, and Bob Huggins is doing his part to deliver just that. Now, what about what he wants — a full house?

Since the games are sold out, there obviously are many ticket holders who don't wish to attend the games. Although your financial support is appreciated, the team would appreciate filled seats. So how about donating those tickets to those who want to attend but either can't afford it or simply can't get tickets because there are none for sale?

Student tickets could be turned into the Office of Student Activities and Services or the Union Program Council Office for distribution to other students. Non-student tickets could be donated to churches, civic organizations or radio stations for distribution.

Lehning steps up against KU

Some have called Shalee Lehning the playmaker for the K-State women's basketball team.

Wednesday night, she was the savior.

The Wildcats narrowly defeated Kansas 59-55, but without Lehning the weaker Jayhawk team would have destroyed them.

K-State came off two straight losses at Nebraska and Baylor and needed a win against KU (6-13, 0-6 Big 12 Conference) to get back in the hunt for the conference title.

This shouldn't have been as hard as it was, considering the Jayhawks came into the game winless in the conference and lost eight of their last 10 games.

The Wildcats (15-4, 3-3 Big 12) also had history on their side, having beaten the Jayhawks 11 straight games dating back to 2001.

Kansas was down by as many as 12 points in the first half, and it looked as if it would become a blowout like most would have predicted.

The Jayhawks fought back, however, and opened the second half on an 8-0 run. They took their first lead of the game at 37-36, and the season-high crowd of 6,597 fans at Bramlage Coliseum began to worry. The game went back and forth for the next 12 minutes, and KU freshman Kelly Kohn hit a jump shot to tie the score at 51 with 3:41 to play.

That's when Lehning decided to take over.

The rest of the Wildcats struggled throughout the game. Lehning knew she had to find the hoop one way or another, and she did just that.

Lehning put on a show while the rest of the Wildcats went completely cold from the field. She never made a field goal in those last few minutes, but went to the free-throw line four times and scored seven of the team's last eight points to lead K-State to victory.

She finished the game with a game-high 17 points and tied for the team lead in rebounds with six.

"I've been focusing a lot on my free-throw shooting

K-State denies Kansas the upset despite sloppy play

By Dayne Logan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Deb Patterson best summed up K-State's narrow 59-55 victory over Kansas during the post-game press conference.

"(It was) a pretty ugly game statistically, and possibly physically," Patterson said Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

The game started off well for K-State (15-4, 3-3 Big 12 Conference), which started with an 8-0 run. The Jayhawks (6-13, 0-6 Big 12) responded quickly, however, closing the gap to a slim 9-7 margin at the 17:09 mark.

The Wildcats began to pull away again three minutes later when junior Kimberly Dietz and sophomore Shalee Lehning recorded back-to-back old-fashioned 3-point plays to put K-State ahead 18-11.

With 9:52 remaining, senior Claire Coggins stole the ball from KU freshman LaChelda Jacobs and fed it to Kari Kincaid, who drained a 3-pointer, giving the Wildcats an 11-point lead.

By halftime, the Jayhawks managed to reduce the lead to 36-29, a margin that could have been less had they converted more than one of their eight free-throw opportunities.

Claire Coggins led K-State with 10 points and three steals in the first half, while freshman Kelly Kohn topped the KU point chart with 10 points, matching her points-per-game average.

Things didn't go as well for the Wildcats in the second half. In fact, the beginning of the half was so ugly, K-State failed to produce a single point for the first five minutes.

FBN | NFL, players reach agreement on tougher drug testing

NEW YORK — The NFL is going deeper into the wallets of players who get caught using steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs.

After four months of sometimes intense negotiations, the league and union announced Wednesday more extensive testing for performance-enhancing drugs and the addition of the blood-boosting substance EPO to its list of banned substances.

The union also agreed players suspended after testing positive will, for the first time, forfeit a portion of their signing bonuses in addition to the salary they will lose during their time away. That is significant because the signing bonuses often are the only guaranteed portion of a player's salary and can be larger than salaries, which sometimes are kept artificially low to keep the team under the salary cap.

"It is important that the NFL and its players continue to be leaders on the issue of illegal and dangerous performance-enhancing drugs in sports," NFL commissioner Roger Goodell said.

In addition to the new test for EPO, the agreement includes an increase from seven to 10 of the number of players on each team randomly tested each week during the season for steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs. That means there will be 12,000 tests each season, up from the current 10,000.

The new policy will make the NFL the only North American sports league to regularly test for EPO. Urine will be tested, not blood, for EPO. Baseball did a round of urine testing for EPO in 2005.

FBN | Manning plays coy about injured thumb

INDIANAPOLIS — Peyton Manning refused to give away any secrets about his bruised right thumb Wednesday.

Manning

The two-time MVP and now AFC champion quarterback kept both hands in his pockets as he walked into his weekly news conference, and when he gestured at the lectern, Manning carefully used his left hand.

He didn't say much more.

"I attended the Bill Belichick school on dealing with injuries, so you know what that is," Manning said, drawing laughter.

Belichick, New England's coach, is known for keeping the status of injured players under wraps.

The thumb injury is a rare nick for the league's best-known ironman outside of Green Bay.

In nine seasons, Manning has started all 156 career games including playoffs, a streak that ranks second among NFL quarterbacks behind three-time MVP Brett Favre.

But with two weeks between his last victory and a Super Bowl date against the Chicago Bears, the injured thumb suddenly became big news. Manning hurt his hand late in Sunday's AFC championship game against New England when he hit it on the helmet of Pro Bowl left tackle Tarik Glenn.

On Monday, coach Tony Dungy said the thumb was discolored and sore and Manning needed X-rays. Team owner Jim Irsay later said the X-rays were negative and Manning was expected to start the Feb. 4 Super Bowl.

FBN | State bar files more charges against Duke lacrosse players

RALEIGH, N.C. — The state bar added ethics charges to a complaint filed against the prosecutor who brought sexual assault charges against three Duke lacrosse players, accusing him of withholding DNA evidence and misleading the court.

The new charges by the North Carolina State Bar against Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong were announced Wednesday and could lead to his removal from the state bar, according to a copy of the updated complaint.

Nifong's office arranged for a private lab to conduct DNA testing as part of the investigation into allegations three men raped a 28-year-old woman hired to perform as a stripper at a party thrown by the lacrosse team last March.

Those tests uncovered genetic material from several men on the woman's underwear and body, but none from any lacrosse player. The bar complaint alleges those results weren't released to defense lawyers in a timely fashion and that Nifong repeatedly said in court he had turned over all evidence that would potentially benefit the defense.

Nifong's actions constitute a "systematic abuse of prosecutorial discretion ... prejudicial to the administration of justice," the complaint read.

Nifong appeared with his attorney at a procedural conference Wednesday morning to discuss scheduling and other administrative details of the ethics complaint.

Last month, the bar charged Nifong with violating four rules of professional conduct by making misleading and inflammatory comments about the athletes under suspicion.

Wildcat high jumper aspires for 2008 Olympics

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senior Kaylene Wagner isn't your typical Californian — she can jump over a 6-foot fence, and she isn't a beach bum.

Wagner started her high-jumping career at Dos Pueblos High School in Goleta, Calif.

Her favorite memory came from that period.

"I went to Junior Worlds in 2002 in Jamaica, and it was my first international experience," Wagner said. "It was the first time I wore the USA uniform, and the whole crowd was there and cheering."

After high school, she remained in California where she high jumped at California Polytechnic State University. There, she won the Big West Conference championship in the women's high jump and finished third at the NCAA Championships in 2004.

"I wasn't really happy with the program there, and it wasn't the competition I was looking for," Wagner said. "After my junior year, my coach quit and moved on to another school."

Wagner

Unhappy and without a coach, Wagner had to find a new home.

Senior Kyle Lancaster, whom she met at Indoor Nationals at Arkansas, told her about coach Cliff Rovelto. Lancaster told her if she wanted to be a good high jumper, she should come jump for Rovelto.

"I went online and looked up his (Rovelto) stats and saw that he was really good," Wagner said. "So I came out here for coach Rovelto."

The only problem was she had to sit out a year. Cal Poly wouldn't release her, so she red-shirted during the 2006 season.

That year off didn't seem to cause any problems.

She owns one of the highest jumps in the Big 12 Conference this season with a leap of 6-1/2 at the KSU All-Comers meet on Dec. 9. That jump automatically qualified her for the NCAA Indoor Championships, March 9-10.

"I see her duplicating things, and that is something she couldn't do a year ago," Rovelto said. "Her confidence and comfort is increasing."

Wagner isn't finished. She still wants to add a couple of inches to her jump.

"I really want to get up and jump around 6-2," Wagner said. "I have been working on approach a lot and my technique. The last couple meets I have felt really good. I just haven't been making bars."

Her goals go beyond the collegiate level. She has her eyes set on an even higher goal than the NCAA Championship: the 2008 Olympics.

"I am going to train for the 2008 Olympic trials," Wagner said. "I will just be here in Manhattan and training with coach Rovelto."

Before that, she has to take on the competition at the Dan DeHart Invitational Friday and Saturday in Albuquerque, N.M. Other members of the K-State track and field team begin competition today at the Roger Cox Multis, which are also at New Mexico.

K-State will compete against Arizona, Arizona State, California, Kansas and Texas Tech.

Wagner will try to continue her hot streak. She has won four titles in a row.

After winning the triple jump last week, sophomore Scott Sellers will high jump again this weekend.

He qualified for the NCAA Indoor meet with a jump of 7-4 1/4 at the KSU All-Comers meet on Jan. 5-6.

Trackwire 25 ranked the women's team No. 7 in this week's poll.

MILITANT GREEK GROUP CLAIMS ATTACK

ATHENS, Greece — A Greek militant group has claimed responsibility for a rocket attack on the U.S. Embassy in Athens earlier this month, blaming American policy in Iraq and the Middle East for the strike.

The far-left group Revolutionary Struggle issued a statement to the weekly Pontiki newspaper, its publisher Dimitris Benekos said Wednesday. He said the statement would be published Thursday, and police said forensic experts were examining the document.

"It is a five-page statement which explains why it chose the embassy as a target, linking (the attack) with U.S. foreign policy in various parts of the world - Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq, Palestine and so on," Benekos told The Associated Press.

"The statement was signed by Revolutionary Struggle," he said.

The Jan. 12 attack caused minor damage but no injuries. The strike using a rocket-propelled grenade alarmed authorities, who fear a possible resurgence of Greek militant attacks that were common in the 1980s and 1990s.

MORTARS HIT SOMALIAN AIRPORT, KILLING 2

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Gunmen launched mortars Wednesday on Mogadishu International Airport, killing at least two people a day after powerful troops from neighboring Ethiopia began withdrawing from this chaotic nation.

The mortar attack in Mogadishu came as Ethiopian troops began pulling out after helping the Somali government drive a radical Islamic militia out of the capital and much of southern Somalia. Ethiopia's intervention last month prompted a military advance that was a stunning turnaround for Somalia's 2-year-old government.

Without Ethiopia's tanks and fighter jets, the government could barely assert control outside one town and couldn't enter the capital, which was ruled by the Council of Islamic Courts. The U.S. accused the group of having ties to al-Qaida.

Abdilkabir Salad, who was at the gate of the airport when the mortars fell, said he saw two corpses. Another witness, Abdi Mohamed, said he saw three wounded men who were hit with shrapnel.

"Two mortars landed inside the airport and the other outside," Mohamed said. "There were three planes on the runway when the attack happened."

U.S., IRAQI TROOPS CLASH IN BAGHDAD

BAGHDAD, Iraq — U.S. and Iraqi troops battled Sunni insurgents hiding in high-rise buildings on Haifa Street in the heart of Baghdad Wednesday, with snipers on roofs taking aim at gunmen in open windows as Apache attack helicopters chattered overhead.

Iraq officials said 30 militants were killed and 27 captured.

New details also emerged about the downing of a private U.S. security company helicopter on Tuesday, with U.S. and Iraqi officials saying four of five Americans who died in the incident were shot execution-style. Violence was unrelenting in Iraq on Wednesday, with at least 69 people killed, including 33 tortured bodies found in separate locations in Baghdad.

The U.S. military said the combined force in the operation, dubbed Tomahawk Strike II, detained seven suspected insurgents and seized heavy weapons, including many rocket-propelled grenades, anti-tank rounds and 155 mm artillery rounds. The Iraqi Defense Ministry said 30 insurgents were killed and 27 captured, including four Egyptians and a Sudanese.

The Manhattan Arts Center is showing a collection of art inspired by the Midwest until Feb. 17.

"Spirit Country" features paintings by Oscar Larmer and ceramic work by Fran Bellucci Johnson.

"It was meant to be a Kansas theme," said Tess Purvis, director of marketing and programs for the arts center.

She said they prefer to display work by local artists.

Both artists said the landscapes of the Midwest, including the Flint Hills, inspire them.

"I like to go out in Riley County," Larmer said. "I take most of my inspiration from nature."

Johnson said she often finds ideas in aerial views of the landscape.

"My work is derived from the landscape," she said. "I really like seeing the land from the plane to see how the landscape changes."

Johnson said people see the carvings and shapes in her art as similar to American Indian art, but this is not intentional.

"I have been influenced by Japanese, English and American slip ware, African and Native American art," Johnson said. "I don't consciously try to emulate them."

Originally from Long Island, N.Y., Johnson moved to Kansas to attend Bethany College in Lindsborg. She started working in ceramics when she was a sophomore.

"I hadn't touched a piece of clay until then," she said.

Johnson said she received her bachelor's degree in art from Bethany and earned her master's degree in art education and ceramics from K-State.

"I've taught public schools and colleges," she said.

Now she teaches at the arts center and in her own studio in Wamego, Kan.

Larmer, a retired K-State professor, said he considers the show to reflect different aspects of his life.

"This is a retrospective show," he said. "A kind of journey, if you wish, of my life, showing the earliest paintings of my life to now. A lot of people think of me as a watercolor painter, but over half of them in this exhibit are oils."

The oil paintings in the exhibit show a more recent part of Larmer's life.

Other paintings show the very beginning of his career as an artist while he was attending the Minneapolis School of Art and Design.

Larmer said his work generally is more abstract.

"All art is abstract, and all art is real," he said.

Students without cars call board 'last resort'

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students who hurry through the K-State Student Union every day might be overlooking a valuable service.

The ride board, a large wooden map in the Union, allows students to post requests for rides or passengers to anywhere in the United States.

The board is across from the food court next to the K-State Wall of Honor.

Jonathan Felber, junior in fine arts, said he received calls for a ride after he posted a ride request to Oklahoma City last semester.

Due to scheduling conflicts, none of the ride offers worked out, but Felber said he recommended using the ride board to any students in need of a ride.

"It has been pretty helpful," Felber said. "I wouldn't have gotten any calls without the board. It's a really good thing. It seems that people check it out."

The Union does not monitor the ride board and its requests.

Roxanne Sanchez, freshman in human ecology, said she posted a request for a ride to Minnesota last week. Sanchez does not have a vehicle at K-State, and said using the ride board was a last resort, because riding with a stranger seemed dangerous.

"If someone calls, I might not even say yes," she said. "I'd have to meet them first. It's an eight-hour drive, and I would not get in the car with a creep."

This might be the reason the ride board is not used as much as it could be, Jack Connaughton, assistant director of the Union, said. He said it also could be because more students are bringing cars with them to college.

"It's a different era in our history," Connaughton said. "I'm assuming it was pretty popular in the '50s, '60s and '70s, back in the days when not every student had a car."

December graduates discuss life after K-State, career plans

By Kendra Stiles
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Every spring, thousands of college graduates leave and try to make a name for themselves. The same thing also happens every winter – but on a much smaller scale.

According to K-State Media Relations, about 2,700 students were candidates for graduation in May 2006. In December 2006, about 1,350 were candidates.

Nacole Boan was one of those December graduates. She earned a degree in political science and a minor in history. Boan finished her time at K-State in 3 1/2 years after taking College Now courses from Johnson County Community College while in high school.

Boan said she didn't mind finishing in December because there weren't as many people with whom to share the attention.

"Graduating in December was kind of nice because not many people were doing it, kind of like it was more specialized," she said. "At the same time, graduation isn't on people's minds – Christmas is – so people forget about graduation, too. It's a double-edged sword."

After graduation, Boan said she decided to pursue graduate school instead of finding a job. Now, she is a graduate student at K-State in the College Student Service Personnel Program and works as a graduate assistant in the Office of Student Activities and Services.

Kerri Keller, director of Career and Employment Services, said December graduates could have a leg up on those graduating in May.

"I think it can be a real advantage sometimes graduating during a less typical time period," she said. "I don't think it's always the case, but occasionally it can really work in your favor. December graduates probably have an advantage when it comes to the All-University Career Fair. It's geared toward everyone, but it's in the fall, so December graduates would be able to take more advantage of that."

Meghan Travers also took college courses during high school and finished her college career in 3 1/2 years. Travers graduated in December with a bachelor's degree in elementary education.

"Graduating was kind of a weird transition because you're changing what you're used to," she said. "I've been enrolling in classes and doing all of that, so I'm not used to being done with school yet."

However, Travers said she agrees with Boan and Keller that a December graduation has its benefits.

"It was interesting to graduate in December," she said. "It gave my friends and family something to get excited about. There was a smaller amount of graduates, so it was a really personal ceremony. And the weather was great, so we were able to take pictures outside. It worked out really well."

Travers made use of the All-University Career Fair in September, participating in mock interviews and making contact with the human resources department in the Blue Valley School District.

"We had such a good connection that he told me he'd contact me in January," Travers said. "I had to apply online and then they checked out my references. I interviewed, and they hired me. CES online helped me to find the mock interviews. It would have been so hard if they didn't bring them to you."

Travers had not started the job search when the Blue Valley School District contacted her. She said she planned on waiting until March or April because that's when most school districts begin looking for new hires.

"Blue Valley was my first choice, but I wasn't looking for a job necessarily," she said. "It all just happened so quickly. I'm very thankful for it."

Until she starts her job, Travers said she will stay in Manhattan to substitute teach in area elementary schools.

"My friends and roommates are still out here, so I wanted to stay and have a four-year college career," she said. "I'll stay in Manhattan and substitute teach until then. It's great because you get to make connections and be in different school districts every day."

Finding a job was easy for Travers, but the same might not be true for other December grads. A time crunch is a big factor in the job hunt, Keller said.

"May graduates have a luxury of time to put off the job search," she said. "We have more recruiters who are here in the fall looking for hires. They may not feel the need to participate in on-campus interviews and other services we offer."

Travers said the best way to work with a December graduation is to get involved with the opportunities provided by Career and Employment Services.

"Explore your options. Come up with a plan for where you want to go and seek out the university for help," she said. "Make strong connections with people and use them to help you in the future."

this year," Lehning said. "I knew my team needed me tonight, so I wanted to step up to the line with confidence."

Her confidence showed as she knocked down free throw after free throw. Without her efforts, K-State would not have survived.

Senior Claire Coggins, junior Kimberly Dietz and freshman Ashley Sweat shot a combined 3-for-18 from the field in the second half and accounted for 10 points altogether, while Lehning scored 11 in the half herself.

With sophomore Marlies Gipson out of the lineup with a knee injury for at least the foreseeable future, this team will have to turn to someone else down the stretch to take over in close games.

Expect the ball to go into the hands of the playmaker, because Lehning showed she has what it takes to lead K-State to victory.

KANSAS | Both teams suffer from scoring draughts in 2nd half

During the drought, KU managed to come back, and even took a one-point lead, before Dietz was able to break the ice for the Wildcats at the 14:54 mark.

As the half progressed, however, both teams struggled to find any sort of offensive rhythm. At one point, two-and-a-half minutes without a basket from either squad.

"I really felt like we just didn't necessarily do a great job with our passing, our handling or establishing a post presence," Patterson said. "I think obviously they guarded us, and it just wasn't a night in which I think we were as efficient and aggressive as we needed to be."

That lack of aggressiveness explains why the Wildcats were outrebounded 54-31.

K-State overcame the rebounding deficit, and with five minutes remaining the score was deadlocked at 48 points apiece.

Thanks to some clutch free-throw shooting by Lehning and freshman Ashley Sweat, combined with weak free-throw shooting on the part of KU, the Wildcats reclaimed a three-point lead with 1:17 remaining.

The Jayhawks managed to stay in the game, but K-State denied the upset when Lehning drew a charge from freshman Danielle McCray with just more than a second remaining and proceeded to sink both free-throws.

"No matter how ugly it got, it's a win," Sweat said.

K-State takes on Iowa State (15-5, 3-4 Big 12) at 2 p.m. Saturday at Hilton Coliseum in Ames, Iowa.

attend the lecture, Reagan said.

Mohammad Alanazi, president of K-State's Saudi Club, attended Prince Turki's K-State lecture last spring and said it encouraged Turki to give a Landon Lecture.

"I think he is a political man, and he can give a talk about politics," Alanazi, graduate student in computer science, said. "The Middle East plays an important role in that area. I encourage everyone to come hear him listen and ask him questions."

Michael Suleiman, distinguished professor of political science, said Prince Turki's comments on Middle East politics are important since Saudi Arabian relations influence the United States and the Middle East region.

"He's ambassador of an important country in the Middle East that has huge oil reserves that are important for industrialized countries, especially the United States, and a country that is a major ally of the United States in the Middle East," said Suleiman, whose academic specialties include Middle East politics.

Saudi Arabia also plays a key role in militaristic, political and economical world issues, Reagan said.

"They've been a staunch ally of the United States, and they play a key role in everything that happens not only just in the Middle East but in the economic scene of the whole world," Reagan said. "It's important to hear from their ambassador directly and, even more importantly, for our students to have the opportunity to question the ambassador."

eating disorder at some point. Of that 20 percent, 75 percent said they did not receive treatment.

Dianna Schalles, nutritionist and health promoter at Lafene Health Center, said she personally has seen an increase in the number of students coming in for eating disorder consults.

Schalles said a good indicator of a pro-anorexia Web site is that eating disorders are glamorized and portrayed as a lifestyle choice and a diet, instead of a disease.

The sites describe people with eating disorders as having will power and self-control, she said.

"It's not real difficult to see that they're attempting to perpetuate eating disorders," Schalles said.

Grefe said she doesn't know who creates the Web sites, but she said it could be people with eating disorders who are looking for company.

"It's painful to think that there are people out there and Web sites to encourage people to stay sick and possibly die," she said.

Schalles said groups like the National Eating Disorders Association lobbied Internet servers, such as Yahoo and MSN, to remove pro-eating disorder sites.

Other Web sites like We Bite Back are against the pro-eating disorder sites and provide support without encouraging eating disorder patterns.

The Lafene Health Center Web site offers a free self-screening tool for students that suspect they have an eating disorder, Schalles said.

She said the free screening is a step-by-step process with a series of questions that can direct them if they need help.

"Regardless of whether or not students do the self-screening, we recommend that they consult a physician, counselor or dietitian," she said. "It doesn't matter which one they pursue; the important factor is that they choose one person to get them started on the road to recovery."

Dorinda Lambert, associate director for Counseling Services, said when a student visits the center, a counselor will assess the level of the severity of problem.

She said the consultations involve helping identify the steps that could reasonably help the person.

However, if the eating disorder is not well-managed and progress hasn't been made, the office can help the person find resources so they consistently could meet with a specialist.

She said the office works closely with the Office of Student Life to see if the student could stay in school while trying to change their behaviors.

"Sometimes the situation is deteriorated so much that we try to help them get connected with resources in the community," she said.

Tax talks slow minimum wage hike

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The minimum wage increase that was supposed to zip through Congress veered onto a collision course Wednesday as lawmakers argued over business tax breaks that would be attached to ensure Republican support.

Democratic leaders in the House began laying groundwork to blame Republicans for any impasse. Senate Democrats, however, cautioned their House colleagues not to jeopardize legislation they'd promised to approve if they gained control of Congress.

House Democrats demanded a clean bill from the Senate — no tax attachment — setting up a confrontation that could delay final congressional passage of the $2.10 an hour increase.

The Senate did vote 54-43 to advance a House-passed measure that would lift the pay floor without any accompanying tax cut. However, that was well short of the 60 votes needed to keep that version moving.

The vote was a signal to the House that without the tax breaks a minimum wage bill appeared doomed in the Senate. The Senate promptly moved to a broader bill, backed by its Democratic leaders, that would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour over 26 months and provide $8.3 billion in tax benefits to businesses over 10 years.

In the House, Democrats threatened to stifle that effort by enforcing constitutional precedents requiring all tax bills to originate in the House. They blamed Republicans for the brewing impasse.

"Democrats are committed to helping small businesses, but we should not delay a minimum wage increase another day in order to negotiate a tax package," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

Senate Democrats seemed more willing to accept the tax portion if it meant fulfilling their campaign promise.

"Both bodies want to keep their eye on the ball," said Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., a co-sponsor of the Senate tax break provisions.

House Democrats could try to alter or even remove the tax package from the Senate version when the two houses try to reconcile their differing versions in a conference committee.

In the meantime, the confrontation exposed difficulties the Democratic majority might well encounter when sending other House legislation to the Senate, where the minority Republicans enjoy more power to shape legislation than in the House.

Still, in a separate vote Wednesday, the Senate effectively killed a modified line-item veto bill. The Republican-inspired measure would have permitted a president to pluck individual items out of spending bills and submit them to Congress for a vote.

Senators also defeated a Republican amendment that would have given only the states the right to increase the minimum wage.

The federal minimum wage has been unchanged for 10 years. In the meantime, a number of states have moved on their own to increase their minimums.

According to the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities, a liberal leaning think tank, inflation has eroded the value of the minimum wage to its lowest level in more than 50 years.

"Minimum wage workers are men and women of dignity," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., a longtime advocate of raising the wage floor, said. "They do some of the most difficult, backbreaking jobs in our society. They deserve a fair wage that respects the dignity of their work and they shouldn't have to live in poverty."

Since the House passed its version two weeks ago, Speaker Pelosi, D-Calif., and Rep. Charles Rangel, the chairman of the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, have prodded the Senate to keep tax proposals out of the bill.

In scheduling the vote Wednesday, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sought to demonstrate the lack of Republican support for a straight minimum wage bill without tax cuts. Every Democrat present voted to cut off debate and five moderate Republicans joined them.

"There seems to be agreement to raise the minimum wage," said Republican Sen. Michael Enzi of Wyoming. "The difficulty has been how do we take care of some of the impact to small businesses that will result from this."

SMU professors accept library, not think tank

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DALLAS — Two leading opponents have softened their stance against building George W. Bush's presidential library and museum at Southern Methodist University but say they still object to the accompanying public policy institute.

Susanne Johnson, associate professor of Christian education, and William McElvaney, a retired theology professor, said Wednesday that SMU's president addressed some of their concerns at faculty meetings.

"I think the library is not the offensive issue that the institute remains to be with a number of the faculty," McElvaney said after a meeting.

However, SMU President R. Gerald Turner said the library, museum and institute were a package deal that would benefit the university.

"It's all or nothing," Turner said. "The question is, does the asset outweigh what you consider the liabilities? I think it does."

A final decision on the library is expected within months, after Bush receives a recommendation from the committee.

If negotiations with SMU fail, the remaining finalist is Baylor University in Waco.

Newly empowered Democratic Congress dismisses proposed troop increase

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — After nearly four years of war in Iraq, newly empowered congressional Democrats look like they've just begun to fight.

In a calculated snub of President Bush, the Democratic-controlled Senate Foreign Relations Committee dismissed plans for a troop buildup in Iraq Wednesday as "not in the national interest" of the United States.

"The president has made his decision," Vice President Dick Cheney fired back, a response that made it clear the administration would go ahead anyway. "We need to get the job done."

The committee vote, 12-9 along party lines, capped hours of debate in which Republicans and Democrats vented their frustration and anger — both with the administration and their own past unwillingness to change the course of a war that has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 U.S. troops.

"There is no strategy. This is a ping pong game with American lives," said Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

"This Congress was never meant to be a rubber stamp," added Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif. "Read the Constitution. The Congress has the power to declare war. And on multiple occasions, we used our power to end conflicts."

Hagel was the only one of 10 committee Republicans to support the nonbinding measure. Several of the panel's 11 Democrats said they favored stronger legislation to register their opposition to the war.

In the wake of midterm election losses, Bush announced two weeks ago that he would order an additional 21,500 troops into the war zone. In Tuesday night's State of the Union address, he implored skeptical lawmakers to give the strategy a chance.

Bush got his answer in less than 24 hours, the timing dictated by Democrats, and Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., the panel's chairman, said tougher measures likely will follow.

"Unless the president demonstrates very quickly that he is unlikely to continue down the road he's on, this will be only the first step. ... I will be introducing ... constitutionally legitimate, binding pieces of legislation. We will bring them up," he said.

Taken together, the committee's vote and Cheney's response suggested the Democrats and the White House were on a collision course — lawmakers drafting ever-stronger measures to change policy in Iraq, and the president exercising his prerogatives as commander in chief — and his veto.

"We are moving forward," Cheney said in an interview with CNN in which he was asked about the troop buildup. "The Congress has control over the purse strings. They have the right, obviously, if they want, to cut off funding. But in terms of this effort, the president has made his decision."

The vice president added: "We've consulted extensively with them. We'll continue to consult with the Congress. But the fact of the matter is, we need to get the job done."

Inside the Senate committee, all Republicans but Hagel opposed the measure, denying Democrats the strong bipartisan vote they had sought.

Biden, who has announced he intends to run for president in 2008, said the legislation is "not an attempt to embarrass the president. ... It's an attempt to save the president from making a significant mistake with regard to our policy in Iraq."

Democrats intend to bring the measure to the Senate floor for a vote next week, and Biden said he is willing, in the interim, to make changes in the hopes of gaining additional Republican support.

Some committee Republicans sought unsuccessfully to temper the measure before it was approved. Additionally, more than a half-dozen GOP lawmakers in the Senate have signaled interest in an alternative that merely expresses disagreement with the president's policy rather than deeming it not in the national interest.

"The thing that I'm deeply concerned about is putting American troops in the middle of this — the cross-hairs of this sectarian battle before the Iraqis' deliver on a series of promised reforms," said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn.

While he said he opposes deploying additional troops in Baghdad, Coleman added he wants to leave open the possibility of a bigger force in the Anbar Province in the western part of the country.

Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, the committee's senior Republican, readily conceded he was not sure Bush's new policy would succeed. But he voted against the measure, saying, "It is unclear to me how passing a nonbinding resolution that the president has already said he will ignore will contribute to any improvement or modification of our Iraq policy."

Lugar also said sponsors of the measure were underestimating their power to force a change.

"We have the ability to require weekly updates from our diplomats and military commanders about the status in Iraq. We should be engaging the administration on almost a daily basis concerning the mission and needs of our troops," he said.

"We should demand of the president precise explanations of his political and diplomatic strategy. We should conduct what amounts to a continuous audit of our economic assistance, to ensure that we are maximizing results."

Some of the most emotional rhetoric of the day came as committee members challenged one another to take a stand.

"If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes," said Hagel.

"This is a tough business. But is it any tougher, us having to take a tough vote, express ourselves and have the courage to step up on what we're asking our young men and women to do?"

Comedy Central show tackles lessons learned on the road, life's journeys

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

What started as a character sketch in a California club transformed into this television season's most anticipated new series.

"The Naked Trucker and T-Bones Show," a semi-live musical comedy show, began last Wednesday on Comedy Central and will run for eight episodes.

The premise for the series began at Largo night club in Los Angeles.

David "Gruber" Allen, most notably known for his recurring role as the counselor on "Freaks & Geeks," opened for performers such as Tena-cious D and Jon Brion. Instead of his usual sketch comedy act, Allen performed wearing nothing but red boots and a guitar, giving birth to the Naked Trucker character.

"It was kind of lazy character building," Allen said.

The act later came to include David Koechner, who starred as Chamo Kind in "Anchorman: The Legend of Ron Burgandy," and recurring character Todd Packer on "The Office."

"Dave Allen and I met when I was on SNL," Koechner said. "Dave was a guest writer for a week in the summer of (19)97. We quickly bonded over growing up in the Midwest."

Before their move to television, Allen and Koechner developed the character mix by performing an opening act at Largo.

"Largo was a great place to work this out," Allen said. "You get a sense that this is a very eclectic club, with performances from Paul Tompkins to Sara Silverman. It was an easy and fun place to put this together."

Koechner plays Gerald "T-Bones" Tibbons, a freeloading drifter who also acts as an idiot savant, and according to Koechner, is "living for every moment."

Allen plays the Naked Trucker, a caffeine-fueled truck driver whose nudity is the ultimate expression of American freedom. Koechner said multiple sources provided inspiration for the show.

"The quest for truth - is that dramatic enough?" Koechner asked. "We try to bring truth to the characters. Our first rule is to always trust our audience and treat them with respect. If people watch, we endeavor to play them as smart and true as possible. I hope you're seeing there is a lot of levels going on."

The show mixes live sketches and video segments filmed from a so-called life on the road. Both actors agree the integral part of the show is the characters' relationship.

"We immediately hit it off onstage - or our characters hit it off onstage," Koechner said. "It's been a beautiful endeavor ever since. It's modeled on an Abbot and Costello, Martin and Lewis style, but at the same time, we like to claim that it's a deconstruction of that."

In the show's opening episode last Wednesday, actor Will Ferrell guest starred as the "Hitchhiker of the Week." Allen and Koechner said viewers can expect more cameos.

"We have a guest appearance in every show," Koechner said. "You get one chance to do a television series, so you might as well call in all the favors or lean on all of your famous friends to help out and bring eyeballs to the show any way that you can."

Allen said guest stars will include Jack Black and Kyle Gass of Tena-cious D, Jim Turner from "ARLISS," Steve Bannos from "Freaks & Geeks," Neil Flynn from "Scrubs," and others.

Koechner and Allen said although converting the live premise to television was difficult, the constituents at Comedy Central have been helpful.

"They give us a lot of freedom," Koechner said. "They know how their network works, and they understand their viewers, so a lot of things are suggested to us, but they never tie our hands. I'd say we're a very good partners in bringing this to television."

Although the Naked Trucker and T-Bones originally were an improvisational act, Koechner and Allen must now write their jokes for television, a task Koechner said is both rewarding and time consuming.

"We like to handcraft our show just like a master brewer might handcraft a beer," Koechner said.

"The Naked Trucker and T-Bones" show is at 9:30 p.m. Wednesday nights on Comedy Central.

Red Bull and vodka at Rusty's

Bartender Jennifer McLaughlin, senior in business management, mixes a Red Bull and vodka at Rusty's Next Door. McLaughlin said she worked at Kite's before starting at Rusty's in May and said bartending is her passion.

"I love it because it is fast-paced," she said. "I meet a lot of people, and I just love making drinks."

McLaughlin will move to Las Vegas to bartend after graduating in May. She has interviewed at The Wynn and Caesar's Palace.

She said Red Bull is the no. 1 energy drink, and she thinks people like the taste.

Rusty's recipe for a Red Bull and vodka

- In a 16-ounce cup, pour three shots of vodka.
- Fill the rest of the cup with Red Bull Energy Drink.

Comedy Central keeps America laughing

Comedy Central is the channel for laughter. Yes, sometimes that laughter, unfortunately for some, comes in the form of Larry the Cable Guy, but nonetheless, most of the channel is funny.

I enjoy "The Daily Show with John Stewart" and "The Colbert Report."

I also enjoy the movies the station shows, with the exception of the numerous commercials that run rampant throughout them.

"Orange County," one of my personal favorites, "Groundhog Day" and "Friday" are just a few movies that have gotten me through insomnia or a day of boredom.

As more and more new programming emerges from the channel, one has to wonder: where do they come up with some of this stuff? But then again, how does anyone come up with anything funny?

With the list of comedians growing, more young, funny people are getting their break on Comedy Central.

For example, Dane Cook is now a certified star. With his two comedy albums, DVDs, TV shows and now film roles, his success is growing. "Retaliation" went platinum, landed at No. 4 on the Billboard 200 and is the most successful comedy album since Steve Martin's "A Wild and Crazy Guy" in 1978.

After landing on Comedy Central's "Premium Blend" and following that with "Comics Come Home," a partnership between Cook and Comedy Central began.

Now if we could just get him to form any sort of partnership with K-State. We all will have to wait and see if the rumors about him coming to Manhattan hold any water.

With Comedy Central, you get slapstick, standup or political humor that appeals to the masses. Hopefully Comedy Central will continue to feature a healthy balance of all kinds of comedy.

Personally, I'm a little tired of "The Blue Collar Comedy Tour," and even though it was successful, I hope all programming doesn't turn into that.

Comedy Central has given us something to tune in to, something that gives people a laugh every once in while, which is what our society needs.

Yes, it might not be politically correct or appropriate all the time, but who said jokes and laughter had to be? Whoever said "laughter is the best medicine," was right.

So Comedy Central, keep doing what you're doing, and make America laugh as much as possible.

Federline ad offends restaurant trade group

COLUMBUS, Ohio — A restaurant trade group said an insurance company's planned Super Bowl ad starring Kevin Federline was insulting to the restaurant industry.

Nationwide Mutual Insurance Co.'s spot shows Federline daydreaming while working at a fast-food joint.

The ad amounts to a "strong and direct insult to the 12.8 million Americans who work in the restaurant industry," National Restaurant Association President and Chief Executive Steven Anderson wrote in a letter.

If the Columbus-based insurer airs the spot, Anderson said his organization will "make sure that our membership ... know the negative implications this ad portrays of the restaurant industry."

The company doesn't mean to offend restaurant employees, said Steven Schreiber, vice president of advertising and brand management.

"We're not making fun of anybody, except maybe Kevin Federline."

State budget changes could help K-State

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State salaries and need-based financial aid could increase if legislators approve Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' budget recommendations for the 2008 fiscal year.

In the recommendation, Sebelius, D-Kan., allocates more than $41 million to higher education. About $30 million would go to operating grant amounts, including the state appropriated Block Grant for Regents university system.

"The governor's budget recommendations for K-State and the other five regent universities are about the best recommendations from any governor that we've seen," President Jon Wefald said. "They're extraordinarily positive."

With the Block Grant for Regents, K-State would receive an average of a 4-percent salary increase. This would go to faculty, staff and student employees.

"I'd be highly ecstatic," said Brecken Jones, assistant building supervisor for the Peters Recreation Complex. "Getting paid more to work at a campus would be awesome. College students are already lacking money."

However, Monica Olsen, who works at the coffee shop in Union Station, said there could be some drawbacks to the pay raise.

"That would be nice, but if it has an effect on the tax, it wouldn't be so nice," Olsen, sophomore in interior design, said.

Olsen said if students were paid more, they would be more likely to apply for university jobs.

"If they knew they're going to get more money, of course they'd apply," she said.

There were no budget cuts in the recommendation, which Wefald said was a good thing for K-State.

"We couldn't ask for a better budget," Wefald said.

The recommendation also includes the Comprehensive Grant Program, where Sebelius would dedicate $3 million, according to the Fort Riley soldiers prepare to deploy to Iraq with ceremony

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Private First Class Timothy Jones embraces his mother, Lisa Alexander, following a deployment ceremony Thursday in King Field House at Fort Riley. Jones is Alexander's only son, who will depart in the coming weeks.

She embraced him with tears rolling down her cheeks.

"This is my only son," Lisa Alexander said.

Alexander and her husband drove from Drummonds, Tenn., to bid her son, Timothy Jones, farewell.

Jones, a 19-year-old private first class, said he enlisted in the army last year to give back to the people who had a hand in raising him.

"He says 'I'm not only in the army to protect my country, I am protecting my mama, too,'" Alexander said.

Members of the surrounding community gathered to honor the 4th Infantry Brigade Combat Team, a 3,400-soldier unit, in a deployment ceremony Thursday afternoon in King Field House at Fort Riley.

The date of the soldiers' departure has not been released.

"There will be no deployment date released due to the safety of the soldiers," said Deb Skidmore, public affairs officer for Fort Riley.

Among the crowd were mayors Bruce Snead of Manhattan and Terry Heldstab of Junction City.

Brigade commander Col. Ricky Gibbs said the soldiers gave back to the community in many ways.

One example was when they put Willie the Wildcat through basic training to prepare him for the Wildcat football season.

Gibbs said although they had short notice, the soldiers are ready to head to Iraq. The soldiers were dedicated and hardworking throughout the entire training process, he said.

"We have been preparing ourselves physically, mentally and spiritually," Gibbs said.

A year ago this same brigade had one-sixth of the soldiers it has now and five percent of its equipment, Gibbs said.

Now it is fully trained and equipped to serve with the other 132,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, President Bush said in his State of the Union address.

This deployment is part of President Bush's plan to boost the number of U.S. troops by 21,500 in the coming months to stabilize Iraq.

Local man caught tagging residences and businesses

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Police arrested a Manhattan man early Thursday morning on charges relating to the spray painting, or "tagging," of local businesses and homes, according to a Riley County Police Department press release.

Zachariah Marcus Richardson, 291 Johnson Road, was arrested for eight counts of criminal damage to property, the press release stated.

Officer Jake Wilson was the arresting officer.

He was on patrol in an unmarked car when he saw a suspicious subject and fresh spray paint on a local business, Capt. Jeff Hooper, Patrol Division Commander, said.

"This is not gang related in any way," Hooper said.

Wilson stopped Richardson and questioned him, then placed him under arrest, Hooper said.

Richardson later confessed to the graffiti on several businesses, Hooper said.

"This arrest was made through excellent police investigative techniques," Lt. Michael Quintanar of the RCPD said.

Hooper said there was little significance to the areas of town being targeted, saying it was more a matter of convenience as Richardson was going and coming from his home.

Debate team dedicates new room to Wefald

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kedzie Hall 007 officially became the new debate room for the K-State debate team Thursday morning. Members and coaches of the debate team and facilities staff watched as President Jon Wefald commissioned the new room.

Justin Green, director of debate for K-State, said the team dedicated the new room to Wefald because of the various ways he has supported the team over the years.

"He has provided both personal and financial support to the team and that is why we are dedicating this room to him," Green said.

After everyone in the room settled, the speeches began. Green spoke first, followed by a speech from a team member, and later an address from Wefald. He spoke about the importance of debate and thanked the people who made the new room possible. Five weeks ago, it was only a basement.

Wefald called the room and day a "celebration of the debate team and department." He called Green a "rising star in the debate world," and congratulated the members of the facilities team who worked to get the room where it is today.

Green said this year has been very exciting for the team, which is ranked seventh in the nation.

This year's topics for debate are Supreme Court cases, including abortion, school desegregation and war on terror detainees.

The competitions are set up as two-on-two teams which prepare arguments for both sides of the issue.

"The winner of the debate depends on a lot of things," said Josh Westmoreland, assistant director of the debate team. "You have to be a Vince Young to be a good debater. You have to be able to research, argue and do everything else to win the debate, but the winner is debatable."

Beth Mendenhall, team member and freshman in political science and philosophy, said her favorite part of being on the team is arguing both sides of an issue because she learns more about the subject up for debate.

Green said the new room will help the team and add to its already long and storied history. In 1991 and 1993, the debate team won the national championship, and to date the program claims more than 15 individual national champions.

Benefit to feature champion bullfighter

The Brett Cushman Memorial Bullfighting competition will be at 7 p.m. Saturday at Weber Arena. The event will feature 30 bull riders, comedy routines and world champion bullfighter Wacey Munsell. Admission is $10 for adults, $5 for ages six to 12 and free for children under six.

Students participate in national survey

Students will get the opportunity to win prizes and improve the campus by participating in the spring 2007 National Survey of Student Engagement. The survey will sample 2,500 freshmen and 2,500 seniors online during the first part of February.

Exhibit features former lecturers

Posters and photographs from past lecturers for the Landon Lecture series are in McCain Auditorium commemorating the 40th anniversary of the series at K-State. The exhibit includes information about the history and a list of speakers since its inauguration in 1966.

Increased deployment

A recent CNN/Opinion Research Corp. poll asked "regardless of how you feel about the war in general, do you favor or oppose President Bush's plan to send about 20,000 more troops to Iraq in an attempt to stabilize the situation there."

Perfectionist has big plans this semester

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Samuel Brinton didn't earn the nickname "Super Sam" without hard work and ambition.

With a dual major in mechanical and nuclear engineering and vocal performance, Brinton's perfectionist habits keep his life balanced and his goals in order. That allows him to complete graduate-level tasks and participate in several activities.

Brinton is a first-year student at K-State but is classified as a sophomore. This semester he will present a research paper at the International Conference on Nuclear Engineering and perform in Mozart's opera "Cosi Fan Tutte," directed by Reginald Pittman, associate professor in music.

"Samuel is an intelligent, talented and self-motivated student," Pittman said.

Brinton said his love for music began when he sang hymns as a young boy prior to sermons from his father, who is a missionary.

Pittman, Brinton's vocal professor, said one of Brinton's biggest accomplishments was placing third at the National Association of Teachers of Singing regional student auditions.

"And that is a four-state region, so that's the reason it's very impressive," he said.

Before he decided to attend K-State, both Harvard University and the Juilliard School accepted Brinton, who said he is a perfectionist and always has gone above and beyond.

"My mom and dad always told me that they knew I could get A's, so that was expected," he said. "Since I can get A's, I do it. Well, my next thing in growth was that I knew I could get A's, but I didn't want to be an academic. I wanted to be a person who could relate to everyone."

Besides academics, Brinton is involved with several organizations for engineering and community service. He also leads the music program for InterVarsity Christian Fellowship.

He keeps and memorizes a number of schedules that outline his daily courses and activities, including sleep.

"I'm one of those people whose time efficiently equals perfection," he said.

Brinton has a part-time job at the Inter-Disciplinary Engineering and Applied Systems lab working for Akira Tokuhito, who gave him the opportunity to write a research paper about nuclear power plant deployment.

Tokuhito, associate professor in mechanical and nuclear engineering, is co-authoring the paper and will attend the conference with Brinton.

Tokuhito said mostly fourth-year and graduate students will be at the conference, and Brinton most likely will be the youngest.

Underclassmen often are eager to do research, he said, but are told they have to wait until they have taken the necessary coursework.

"I've been lucky," he said. "I've come across quite a few students like Samuel, and I like to work with them early because I know there are interesting things to do without having gone through all the course work."

Brinton was homeschooled and moved 19 times because his parents are missionaries. From his experiences, he said he is able to moderately speak about six languages including Eze Eja, an Amazonian language from a tribe he lived with while in Bolivia.

Samuel Brinton, a dual major in mechanical and nuclear engineering and vocal performance, sits with Reginald Pittman, associate professor in music, at McCain Auditorium Thursday.

Lyndsey Born | COLLEGIAN

He now is learning to speak Japanese. While being homeschooled, Brinton took Advanced Placement classes from a public school so he could complete twice as many courses.

He also took courses online from institutions to receive college credit.

He graduated as valedictorian of his class and was academic all-state in Iowa.

"I actually was very much looking forward to college, and college slowed down a little bit from my senior year," he said.

Brinton said he thinks he will pursue a doctoral degree in nuclear engineering, and also take his music as far as possible.

"I'd really like to audition to get into a high opera company and then do that for possibly a summer," he said.

For engineering, he said he would like to work for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and possibly the United Nations.

"I still don't know what I'm going to do next year," he said. "I mean, how do you get better than the International Conference on Nuclear Engineering? I don't know, we'll figure out something."

'Robin Hood' opens at MAC Saturday

By Katelynn Hasler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Arts Center will present two performances of its youth production, "Robin Hood," at 3 and 7 p.m. Saturday. Tickets are $10 for adults and $5 for children.

"I've been watching rehearsals, and it's outstanding," said Tess Purvis, director of marketing and programs for the arts center, 1520 Poyntz Ave.

Missoula Children's Theatre is producing the play. The group brought directors, props, scripts and costumes and then auditioned children from Manhattan and the surrounding areas to play the roles, Purvis said. She said there are more than 59 children involved in the play.

Auditions were Monday, followed by a week of intensive rehearsals before Saturday's performance, Purvis said. The actors are filling roles behind the scenes as well.

"It's great because the kids are not only actors, but also assistant directors and other tech positions too," Purvis said.

In addition to the performance, the arts center offered a workshop on Thursday for adults who work with children's theater or would like to do so.

The arts center also offers children's theater, music, clay and painting classes. Each theater season, the arts center presents at least one family show.

"I don't think people realize how family-oriented we are," Purvis said. "A lot of times when people think the Manhattan Arts Center they only think of theater, but we have a lot of different events for families to come to."

College of Veterinary Medicine helps KDHE establish avian influenza hotline

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although there have been no reported cases of avian influenza in the United States, K-State is doing its part to protect Kansas residents and inform them about the virus.

The College of Veterinary Medicine and the Kansas Department of Health and Environment worked together to create a hotline designed to give information and answer questions surrounding avian flu. It began operating earlier this month.

"It's a hotline for people who have questions about their risk of being exposed to the bird virus from having close contact with birds," said Mike Heideman, communications specialists at the KDHE. "It's not a dead bird hotline."

Heideman said the hotline will be useful if the avian flu reaches the United States or if the virus begins to spread more easily between people.

"We just want to have something in place in case something like that does occur," he said. "We don't know that it will, but it makes sense to have the hotline for that reason."

In cases of avian flu in humans, infection occurs through contact with an infected bird.

Chavez' response to comments immature, silly

There is a 5-year-old at the day care where I work who gets mad if people look at her. They don't have to say or do anything, but if she senses even a peripheral glance in her direction, happiness does not ensue.

MEGAN MOLITOR

I was reminded of this girl upon hearing about Venezuelan president Hugo Chavez's reaction to comments made by Tom Casey, U.S. State Department deputy spokesperson.

According to Fox News, Chavez is pushing for approval of an "enabling law," which would give him the authority to pass laws by decree for an 18-month period. The Venezuelan National Assembly is expected to grant him approval this week. Conveniently, this assembly is made up of many amigos of the president.

Since he's already gaining speed sliding down a slippery slope of political power, why stop there?

Fox News also stated Chavez has plans on turning Venezuela into a socialist state, and consequently wants to take control of CANTV, the country's main telecommunications company, among other nuggets of fun.

Upon hearing these potentially catastrophic plans, spokesperson Casey simply stated that Chavez's plans "have caused us some concern".

That's it. No fireworks, no threats to blow Venezuela into smithereens, nothing. Therefore, Chavez' response to Casey's comment with a sunshine-filled statement of "go to hell, gringos, go home," seems slightly out of place to me.

Somebody might have jumped the gun a little bit. I think the United States is correct to be "concerned" about any country stepping further away from democracy and stomping on the numerous freedoms that we as Americans enjoy daily.

Casey's comments did not warrant a rant so immature and uncalled for, and instead of defending his actions and plans, Chavez attacked U.S. foreign policy decisions and our involvement and continued force in Iraq.

He also attacked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on his weekly radio talk show last Sunday, going as far as to call her "missy."

"Missy"? Our Secretary of State has been demoted to what I call my 5-year-olds in day care? Are we world leaders, or children?

The United States, playing the role of concerned older brother, commented on Chavez, the younger sibling, playing schoolyard bully. Instead of being a big boy about it, he throws his toy truck at us.

A slight exaggeration, sure. But the basic picture is the same. The United States might be guilty of being a little over-zealous in its foreign affairs, but as of yet, all we have done in light of Chavez' recent ideas is wince a little. In light of Chavez' bizarre response, maybe somebody is getting a little nervous.

What I would be excited for is for the United States to comment back. As of yet, it hasn't. Are we afraid they'll wave their precious oil production in our faces and snatch it away? We've said a harsh word or two over lesser matters. I would be delighted to sit back with some popcorn and watch a little verbal jarring take place.

When the aforementioned 5-year-old gets cranky when her peers look at her, we have to move her magnet on the board from green to yellow. I think Chavez's magnet should go straight to red, at least until he grows up a bit.

Prince Turki Al-Faisal, Saudi Ambassador to the United States, shakes Abdulmajeed Alharbi, sophomore in computer science, at the dinner for Saudi Club members Thursday evening at the K-State Alumni Center. The ambassador will speak at the Landon Lecture today at 10:30 a.m. at McCain Auditorium.

Shaking stereotypes

Students should take opportunity to learn about world events

Terrorism became a buzz word after Sept. 11.

The word sent chills down the back and conjured up images of war in the Middle East.

After Sept. 11, the world focused on squelching terrorism and its counterparts. The results: increased security and furious suspicions.

Without knowing it, people began sling- ing gross generalizations across cultures – not only with words, but with actions.

But, the times, they are a-changin'.

We hope.

Thousands of Saudi students now attend colleges in the United States because of a program President Bush and Saudi King Abdullah established in fall 2005. The Saudi government gives scholarships, encouraging students to leave their homes to travel across the world to obtain an education. The program also speeds up processing visas and paperwork, providing students with a shorter waiting period to get into the country.

Because of this program, an increasing number of Saudi students are at K-State, bringing diversity and a new perspective about the Middle East.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Some students might not understand what has happened or what is happening in the Middle East. As painful as it is to state, some might not care.

But we submit that ignorance is not bliss.

One step to combat apathy and a glazed-over look: begin listening to the voices.

Prince Turki al-Faisal, the outgoing ambassador of Saudi Arabia to the United States, will speak at K-State today. Prince Turki is the voice of a nation needing to be heard. His is a voice begging for a chance.

Today is an opportunity for people to hear from an expert about the events happening in the Middle East. This type of firsthand account is invaluable.

Not only will today's Landon Lecture provide an opportunity to hear from Prince Turki, it also is a time to ask questions.

Don't drown in questions – ask. Don't allow fear to keep you uneducated.

This is a time to look at life, war and fear from another person's perspective.

Make decisions, not based on the vague perceptions of others, but on your own convictions. And don't let a preconceived notion keep you from knowing the truth.

Students should further MLK's legacy

It seems as though the courage and hunger for equal rights that Martin Luther King and many other civil rights activists had is just not in the hearts of young college students, especially African-Americans.

For instance, last week K-State helped sponsor a series of events in honor of King. Present was a plethora of students and faculty supporting the events, and to every single student there I commend you for knowing what is important. But there could have been more.

All that week I heard excuses from friends about why they couldn't go to the Emmett Till documentary or participate in the King march.

Was it too cold outside? Did you have class? Or did you just feel like taking a nap?

A lot of times we are not concerned about these types of events because we feel we don't have anything to fight for.

We should be recruiting and encouraging our friends to be active.

We have made strides when it comes to racial equality, but we cannot stop now. Attending these types of events not only enlightens but it shows others that you are interested in your heritage and wish to support the causes of your fellow K-Staters.

One main problem is more and more young people are growing up without a sense of where they came from. People don't realize what their ancestors had to fight for so they could be in the position they are in today.

According to a recent USA Today article titled "Civil rights for a new generation," civil rights organizations like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People are struggling to attract young people.

Why should they have to struggle to attract young people? We should want to become educated on the issues that affect us.

According to the same article, NAACP President Bruce Gordon said the NAACP's membership exceeded 600,000 in 1945 but fell to 259,000 by 2000.

He said he hopes to expand the NAACP's membership to 1 million by 2009, its 100th anniversary.

This is an attainable goal, if young people step up.

It could be we are so into our lives, classes, jobs and families that we do not think about the racial inequalities that still exist.

For example, last fall Michigan voters approved a ban on affirmative action at public universities – this directly affects us.

Being a part of organizations like NAACP and keeping up on the news will open our eyes up to what's still going on in the world.

These problems are not just for the 'old folks' to take care of. We need to wake up, lead and educate.

During the 1950s and 1960s the NAACP was struggling to get blacks in positions of power so black people could have a say in what goes on in the government.

Now in 2007, we have a black presidential candidate – Illinois Democratic Sen. Barack Obama – who in my opinion has a really good chance at the primaries. We already have a black Secretary of State in Condoleezza Rice.

However, we must realize that everything our ancestors have fought for can be lost in the blink of an eye.

Those before us have come a long way. But there is still a long way to go.

FROM THE PUBLIC EDITOR

Take it or leave it, this liaison is here for you

You might already hate me. You might already love me. Most of you have never met me.

Ever laughed at the stupidity of 'Tabernacle Woods,' or simmer with emotion after glancing at the political cartoons?

I am the author of both, and for the past semester I have been watching responses from readers as an observer, secretly listening to your snide comments, head-shaking snickers or shouts of indignation in class and around campus.

So allow me finally to introduce myself.

My name is Donnie Lee. This semester, I have been appointed an additional and rather tedious position, one that comes with a greater responsibility than drawing binge-drinking bunnies and nerdy turtles.

I fill the shoes of last semester's public editor, Logan C. Adams, who is now the metro editor. As public editor, I can formally receive your complaints, praises or concerns about the Collegian or answer your questions about why we do the things we do. If you read about something you don't like, please don't mutter it under your breath. Turn around and tell me about it if I'm sitting behind you in class.

If you see me in the street, just approach me. Don't be afraid to get my attention, even if it is just to say "hi."

I promise I'll be patient with you and never turn you down. You'll see that I'm not such a bad guy.

I have a sense of humor about pretty much anything you'll want to talk about. But,

DONNIE LEE

I won't be your therapist.

One way to find me is at the K-State Student Union food court every Friday from noon to 2 p.m. I'll expect a lot of you to come and keep me company. If you can't reach me there, stop by the newsroom at Kedzie 116 and ask for me.

It's not hard to find, but it's a little hole in the wall, and I pretty much live there along with my other cavemen journalist colleagues.

Or if you must, e-mail me at djl2628@ksu.edu.

I look forward to talking to you and seeing what you have to say about our newspaper. Bring some acorn brew while you're at it.

Donnie Lee is the Collegian's public editor and a senior in social sciences. Please send comments to publiceditor@spub.ksu.edu or catch him in person noon to 2 p.m. Friday at the K-State Student Union food court.

TO THE EDITOR

Letter misses point of Title IX editorial

Editor,

In response to Stephanie Bell's letter:

You like horses. We get it. You felt the need to write a letter to the editor regarding the Title IX article saying you support Title IX and the equestrian team is good.

Nobody ever said you were bad. But nobody cares that you are good, and that is the exact problem with women's equestrian.

The point of the editorial in question was to point out the ineptitude and absurdity of the Title IX legislation, not attack the women's equestrian team.

The sports programs at K-State should be ones supported by the student body and the community. While I'm sure women's equestrian matters to several people here at K-State, that interest is not enough to warrant a varsity sport.

Soccer as a sport is rapidly growing in popularity and yet K-State does not have a men's or women's program. The rodeo club here always puts on a show to a packed house. My high school graduating class numbered 59, yet our school had varsity women's softball. K-State is in the Big 12 Conference and does not.

Women's equestrian is not as popular or as accessible – the capital it costs to buy, maintain and travel with livestock of that caliber is outrageous – as any of these other sports. Equestrian is in the best interests of individuals on an equestrian scholarship, but not in the best interests of the student body, the community or the university. The only reason equestrian exists is the sheer numbers needed to comply with this outdated type of athletic affirmative action.

If we had all these other, more popular sports on campus, I would have no problem with having a women's equestrian team. Let me know when you guys go to the Super Bowl of women's equestrian. I'll be at the women's table tennis match.

Title IX editorial presents misleading facts

Editor,

We are disappointed in the Collegian staff for its lack of professionalism and journalistic responsibility in the editorial "Title IX needs to be re-evaluated," printed Jan. 23.

It presents misleading facts and misrepresents the K-State Equestrian team. In the editorial, the staff writes, "The problem is that it's about numbers, not interest level – or more importantly, talent."

An average of 120 women try out every year. Twenty-three schools nationwide have varsity equestrian teams, and more join every year.

As far as talent, the K-State equestrian team has seen success at the national level all six years of its short history. Last season the team earned three individual national championships. Maybe if the Collegian had reported on a single one of the five competitions this past semester, the staff would have been more aware.

The Collegian staff should re-examine their coverage before they accuse anyone of unfairness. The comment about the scholarship allotment is misleading.

In the editorial, the Collegian said 69 equestrian team members earned a scholarship compared with baseball's 11.7. Actually, the team is given 15 full scholarships for its 77 athletes. The 15 scholarships are divided between 69 women on the team.

Title IX does come with advantages and disadvantages.

However, less mainstream sports like rowing, golf and tennis wouldn't exist on a collegiate level without Title IX. There is no doubt many club sports deserve to be varsity sports, but unfortunately not every sport can be.

The equestrian team works hard to represent K-State and deserves as much respect as any other sport.

The Collegian writers are the ones who need to do some re-evaluating.

CURFEW IMPOSED IN LEBANESE CAPITAL

BEIRUT, Lebanon – University students loyal to Lebanon's government clashed with Hezbollah supporters Thursday, setting cars ablaze and battling with homemade clubs and stones. The melee deepened worries that Lebanon cannot contain the political and sectarian rivalries threatening to push it toward civil war.

At least three people were killed and dozens injured before army troops backed by tanks and firing barrages of warning shots into the air dispersed most rioters. The military then declared Beirut's first curfew since 1996.

But the fallout reaches far beyond the casualty count. The clashes, sparked by a cafeteria scuffle between pro-government Sunni Muslims and pro-Hezbollah Shiites, reinforced fears that Lebanon's sectarian divisions are erupting into violence as they did during the 1975-1990 civil war.

1 KILLED, 20 WOUNDED IN GUNFIRE EXCHANGE

GIZA, Egypt – Gunfire broke out Thursday between police and protesters opposed to construction of a cell phone tower south of Giza, and one man was killed and 20 people were wounded, authorities said.

Several thousand residents of Kafr Turk, a town about 19 miles south of Cairo's twin city of Giza, had gathered to protest an attempt by Orascom Telecom – the owner of the Mobinil cell phone company operator in Egypt – to erect the tower in the area.

The angry residents were afraid exposure to electronic signals from the tower would cause health problems.

ATTACK ON NUKE PLANT WOULD BE 'CATASTROPHIC'

DAVOS, Switzerland – The head of the U.N. atomic watchdog agency, in an indirect warning to the United States and Israel, said Thursday a military strike on Iran's nuclear facilities would have "catastrophic" consequences and only strengthen Tehran's resolve to make atomic arms.

Mohamed El-Baradei, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, also cited intelligence assessments that Iran may be four years away from having the capacity to produce such weapons.

"A preventive strike would be catastrophic," ElBaradei said at a panel discussion at the World Economic Forum, adding it would only "strengthen the hand of those who say 'let us develop a weapon.'"

While El-Baradei did not name any nation, his comments were clearly directed at Israel and the United States, which have both suggested a strike on Tehran's nuclear facilities was not off the table unless the Islamic republic ended its nuclear defiance.

Lack of Fourum reason for loss of readership

Editor,

As I walk through the halls of the K-State Student Union, I can't help but think that the powers-that-be for the Collegian must have failed every business class they took in college.

I haven't taken any such classes, but I do know a few things about how to sell a product. For instance, when you have a small section in your paper that single-handedly is the reason every copy you produce is taken and strewn about campus, you don't change it.

Then, after your readers continue to complain about your changes, you certainly don't decide to do away with the section entirely. Now I know you guys are just trying to keep people from being offended and having their images ruined, and that's good. But I think that is what the Fourum was for.

Don't get me wrong, I'm not advocating tarnishing someone's reputation. I'm just exploring the idea that maybe everybody enjoyed the harmless cracks. As a member of the greek community, I never was offended by anti-greek comments. I'm also guessing nobody who lives in the residence halls has ever been in a real uproar over something said about them.

The point is, a few semesters ago, you would have been hard pressed to find an unread copy of this paper after noon. Now, you can walk up to any paper bin on campus at 3 p.m. and find that not even a quarter of the papers have been touched.

The Fourum was the most popular and most read part of the Collegian. It's common sense to realize the Fourum's removal is the reason no one cares to open this paper anymore. As a matter of fact, I doubt anyone even will read this.

Wildcats to face tall task against Nebraska

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When you're Jason Bennett, it's tough to pick on someone your own size.

Take, for instance, the game when Bennett blocked 31 shots as a 6-foot-10 seventh-grader.

"They were all very, very small," Bennett recalled. "It really wasn't fair."

The last time K-State (14-6, 3-2 Big 12 Conference) took the floor, the 7-foot-3 freshman set a school record with eight blocks against an undersized Chicago State squad in a 73-36 victory.

However, Bennett and the Wildcats face a tough undertaking when center Aleks Maric leads Nebraska (12-6, 1-3 Big 12) for their 5 p.m. match-up Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

Maric ranks first in the conference in shooting percentage (63.7 percent), fourth in rebounding (7.9) and fifth in scoring (18.0).

K-State faced a similar threat in Iowa State's Jiri Hubalek, who scored 17 points against the Wildcats a week ago.

However, coach Bob Huggins said the 6-foot-11 Maric presents an even bigger challenge.

"He's twice as wide," Huggins said. "He's 270 pounds. He's so hard to get around."

Meanwhile, point guard Charles Richardson triggers Nebraska's perimeter game. Richardson attended Chicago's Proviso East High School, which also produced K-State recruit Jacob Pullen.

Richardson leads the Big 12 in assist-to-turnover ratio, while Nebraska's Ryan Anderson, Marcus Perry and Jay-R Strowbridge all shoot better than 45 percent from behind the 3-point arc.

"They've had four guys make seven threes in a game," Huggins said. "I don't know if we have four guys who can make seven threes in a season. You give them an open shot, and they'll knock it down."

K-State struggled knocking down anything the last time these teams met in Manhattan. K-State shot just 23 percent from the floor and lost 57-42.

Senior Cartier Martin, who scored 25 points in Monday's romp over Chicago State, said he hasn't forgotten last season's loss to the Huskers.

"Last year, man, they got us here at home," Martin said. "This year we feel like we need to protect our home court no matter what. They'll need to play one of their best games to beat us."

K-State vs. Nebraska

When: 5 p.m. Saturday
Where: Bramlage Coliseum
TV: Fox Sports Midwest

That might very well prove true, as K-State seems to be playing its best basketball of the season. The Wildcats have won four straight games, averaging nearly 75 points per game in the process.

"I look out there and it's a totally different team than I saw against William & Mary, when we were bumping into each other," Huggins said.

Wildcats will start 2-game road stretch at Iowa State

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's Wednesday night clash with Kansas did little but demonstrate both teams' ability to not score a basket. Though the Wildcats escaped with a 59-55 win, the rampant sloppy play and poor shooting had to be disconcerting for the team and its fans.

The Wildcats (15-4, 3-3 Big 12 Conference) travel to Ames, Iowa, Saturday to face the Cyclones. Just what can they do to prevent a repeat of Wednesday night's embarrassment?

"The slightest bit of effort would be a real good place to start," coach Deb Patterson said.

Patterson called the KU game a "freak of nature," saying the K-State was uncharacteristically ineffective on the offensive end of the court.

K-State also struggled defensively, giving up 19 offensive rebounds to the Jayhawks. That type of play could be disastrous against the Cyclones (15-5, 3-4), who boast one of the Big 12's most effective point guards in senior Lindsey Medders.

The Wildcats will need to aggressively defend Medders, who is averaging 13.2 points and 6.5 assists per game. She scored 56 points in two outings against K-State last season.

"(Medders) is a great player," Patterson said. "I think we'll probably have to mix our defensive looks on her and vary our matchups some. We've known every year what a great player she is, and she still seems to get off on us."

Though K-State is 0-3 on the road in Big 12 play this season, the players said they're looking forward to returning to Ames, where they earned a 73-64 victory last year.

"You know, I'm really proud of the win at (Iowa State last year) because it's really tough to beat them up there," senior Claire Coggins said.

Sophomore Shalee Lehning, who led the Wildcats against the Jayhawks with a game-high 17 points, said they will need to execute well for an entire game, something they didn't do against Kansas.

"We have to come with great focus and intensity, knowing (Iowa State) is going to play well," Lehning said. "They're going to bring 40 minutes of tough basketball, so we're going to go in and be ready to compete."

Freshman Ashley Sweat goes for a block against Kansas' Shaquina Mosley during the second half Wednesday. K-State held off the Jayhawks 59-55 to improve its record to 3-3 in conference and 15-4 overall. Christopher Hanewinkel COLLEGIAN

Federer's dominating 3-0 win demonstrates greatness

This was supposed to be it. The stars aligned, the table was set, the ducks were all in a row. Pick whatever cliché you'd like.

The point is, this was supposed to be the day Roger Federer, the most dominant tennis player in the world, went down.

The Australian Open semifinal paired Federer with American Andy Roddick. Forget about the fact Roddick was 1-12 lifetime against Federer. Nevermind Federer won each of the last three hardcourt Grand Slam events. This was a different Andy Roddick.

Gone was the Roddick of old. In his place was a man, who after a terrible start last year, found a new coach in Jimmy Connors, and in doing so, found himself playing some of the best tennis of his life.

DAYNE LOGAN

Roddick played so well, in fact, he already had knocked off Federer earlier this month in the final of the Kooyong Classic.

The win didn't officially count because it was an exhibition tournament, but that wouldn't matter once Roddick duplicated the feat in Australia. Based on his opening round performances, Roddick looked poised to do just that.

The American coasted through the early stages, had a hiccup against Mario Ancic in the fourth round but then rebounded nicely with a dominant quarterfinal showing against fellow countryman Mardy Fish. Two upsets in the other half of the bracket left the door wide open for Roddick to win his first Grand Slam event since 2003.

Unfortunately, Federer had a different outcome in mind.

The Swiss native drubbed Roddick in straight sets (6-4, 6-0, 6-2).

Federer made Roddick, well-known as one of the hardest hitters in the game, look like a lightweight.

No matter where the American hit the ball, Federer would glide into position and hammer a winner just out of reach.

At one point in the second set, Roddick, clearly frustrated, accidentally threw his racket in the direction of a cameraman as he launched a ball out of the stadium.

He should have thrown it at his opponent, who at that point was running away with the match.

In the end, a day that was supposed to narrow the gap in professional tennis turned into Roger Federer's personal declaration to the world that the divide is bigger than ever.

Federer later called it the best match he'd ever played.

In truth, it might have been the best performance in the history of tennis.

TEN | K-State goes for 5th-straight win over Drake

The K-State women's tennis team hopes to seal its third consecutive season opening dual win Saturday when Drake

K-State vs. Drake

When: Noon to 5 p.m.
Saturday
Where: Ahearn Field House

comes to town for the first dual match of the season.

K-State had its first tournament last weekend at the Georgia Invitational Tournament, but it wasn't a dual match and didn't contribute points to the Wildcats' team score.

In doubles competition, Klimova and Kudlackova defeated No. 46-ranked Rawia Elsis and Claudia Strauss from Troy.

Also winning in doubles matches were the teams of junior Tamar Kvaratskhelia and Perevoshchikova and Yrureta and junior Fernanda Da Valle.

Drake is 0-3 in competition this season. They lost to No. 43 Indiana (6-1) and Tulsa (6-1) on Jan. 20 and Kansas (4-1) on Jan. 21.

K-State defeated Drake last year 7-0 in Manhattan. Drake's only win last year against the Wildcats came in doubles, when Veronika Leszayova and Sarah Plowman defeated Klimova and Da Valle 9-8.

Coach Steve Bietau said the team is ready for the dual matches to begin.

"We're excited to get the team portion of our schedule underway," he said. "To me, this is the most exciting part of college tennis."

"I think it's the most fun for the players and it may be the most interesting to watch. This is what we point towards all year; to get ready for our team matches."

K-State has won five straight duals against Drake. However, the focus is not on the opponent this weekend, Bietau said.

"We're more trying to find out how good we are," he said. "It takes time to know for sure."

Klimova finished the fall with a 1-7 singles mark and a 5-5 doubles record. She said last weekend's tournament was helpful for the team.

"We got the idea of what everyone should work on before the dual matches start," she said.

Klimova netted two singles victories last weekend and also one doubles victory. While last weekend was more individual than most of the spring tournaments because team points are not awarded, Klimova said she's looking forward to playing for her team.

"You feel the pressure because you're playing for your team," she said. "You have to play your best to win the matches. I think everyone here wants to achieve and wants to win."

Kudlackova went 2-1 last weekend in singles play and 1-2 in doubles. Kudlackova said playing at home will be a different experience than playing on the road.

RUN | Fretwell in 10th place after 1 day of Roger Cox Multis

One day into the Roger Cox Multis track and field events, only one Wildcat had participated in an event.

Fretwell

Sophomore Adam Fretwell is in 10th place in the men's heptathlon after three events.

Fretwell placed seventh in the 60-meter dash with a sprint of 7.14. He placed sixth in the long jump with a leap of 22-5 3/4 and placed 13th in the shot put with a throw of 36-9 3/4.

Fretwell's total score is 2,857 — 415 points behind the leader.

The rest of the Wildcat Track Team will start competition today in the Dan DeHart Invitational.

"It will be good competition," said coach Cliff Rovelto. "It is a new facility, so it is a nice place."

Junior Loren Groves and Junior Lacl Heller will look to improve their distance in the weight throw. Both are provisionally qualified for the Indoor NCAA Championships. Groves threw 67-10 1/4 at the KSU Invitational. Heller threw 65-1/2 at the KSU Invitational.

Senior Kaylene Wagner tries to continue her winning streak to five in the women's high jump and sophomore Scott Sellers returns to the men's high jump after competing in the triple jump last week.

Senior Lamar Garrett will try to hold Sellers off in the high jump after Garrett's win last week with a jump of 6-9 1/2.

Junior Morgan Bonds has the fastest time in the Big 12 Conference with a race of 2:07.87 in the 800-meter run.

40 soldiers sent to Arizona to help secure border

By Caitlin Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Kansas National Guard sent 40 soldiers two weeks ago to Arizona in order to help with Operation Jump Start, a mission to counter illegal immigration and secure the U.S.-Mexico border.

Their mission will last between 15 and 30 days.

The Department of Homeland Security instituted Operation Jump Start in 2006 as a result of the Sept. 11 attacks, according to the homeland security Web site.

In a speech at Anzalduas Park in August 2006, President Bush said "One of the things you'll hear me talk about is the need to modernize the technology along this border. And that's what we're going to do."

The operation consists of five steps that Bush mentioned in his speech including securing the border, building a virtual border using infrared and motion sensors, stopping "catch and release" of illegal immigrants, resolving the status of illegal immigrants already in the U.S. and helping immigrants assimilate into society.

"We're certain the Kansas soldiers being deployed this time will represent Kansas well too," said Nicole Corcoran, press secretary for Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, D-Kan. "Utilizing State troops to protect our borders from illegal immigration is an ongoing mission of the President that many states participate in."

Sharon Watson, director of public affairs for the Adjutant General's Department of the state of Kansas, said the Kansas

National Guard is important to the success of this mission.

The 2nd Battalion, 130th Field Artillery, is the second group of Kansas National Guard soldiers sent to help with Operation Jump Start.

The first group, the 184th Civil Engineering Squadron was sent to help build a wall in certain parts of the border, Watson said.

In a press release in July

2006, Sebelius said, "It's Washington's responsibility to defend our borders, but since we've seen precious little action nationally on that front, states like Kansas are stepping up."

I fully support this operation, have authorized our state to participate and know the men and women of the National Guard are ready to help secure our border."

Student Senate allocates funds to Honor and Integrity System

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate members passed a bill allocating $15,000 to K-State's Honor and Integrity System office at their weekly meeting Thursday night.

The allocated money was transferred into the Student Centered Tuition Enhancements account from the now-defunct Wildcat Information Network account, and the allocation will fund an assistant in the system's office, according to the legislation.

Matt Wagner, Privilege Fee Committee chair, said the bill received special orders at Thursday's meeting since the Student Centered Tuition Enhancements account had reached zero dollars for Fiscal Year 2007. The Controller's Office disperses funding from tuition increases into the account, and Student Governing Association's University Relations Committee allocates the money to worthy university functions, Wagner, senior in information systems, said.

While the funding had originally been budgeted for Fiscal Year 2007, Wagner said it was inadvertently left out in last year's Student Senate legislation.

"The funding had been held off for sometime because we were trying to figure out the confusion of where to get the money from since we were at a zero balance," he said.

In other business, Senate members unanimously approved the following people to serve on the Elections Review Committee: Alex Sune, chairman and senior in management; judicial members Michael Riley, junior in political science and Peter Taylor, sophomore in open option; legislative members Ashley Boldt, senior in family studies and human services; Bryan Cox, sophomore in political science; and Kyle Lawrence, senior in political science. Boldt, who also serves as Student Senate chairwoman, said committee members cannot run in the upcoming Student Governing Association elections or support any SGA election candidates.

"The committee is around in case anyone would contest results or if there would need to be a sanction with a candidate so it doesn't all fall on the elections commissioner," Boldt said.

Purpose of 'SGA Hears You Week' to boost student participation

By Natasha Meyers
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Governing Association's "SGA Hears You Week," an effort to educate students with posted fliers, handouts and a member-run booth, begins Monday.

Ashley Boldt, Student Senate chair, said the booth is convenient because it has a set time and place in the K-State Student Union for people to visit.

"The week is going to be a combination of events that show our appreciation to the students at K-State, as well as events that will offer students the chance to voice their opinions and also learn about getting involved in SGA," said Boldt, senior in family studies and human services.

"SGA Hears You Week" will take place Monday through Friday in the Union.

Students who visit the booth can receive prizes, including snacks, drinks and K-State apparel.

"A student voicing their opinion and offering ideas and suggestions is really important," Boldt said. "Because SGA works so closely with K-State administration, as well as government officials, we can work to make positive changes really happen."

The week of outreach was planned for a number of reasons, including getting students involved and spreading an understanding of what SGA does, said Amy Schultz, sophomore in pre-med and chair of the College Council Allocations Committee.

It also is a way to tell a large number of students what positions are available and how to apply, she said.

The inquiries or problems can range from academics to how campus issues are handled, said Molly Hamm, vice chair of the University Relations Committee and sophomore in English and secondary education.

Hamm said they might not always be able to help with students' questions or concerns, but will try to aid in any way they can.

"We can try to handle things as best as we can," Hamm said. "If it's an issue that SGA can't help with, we can certainly try to find out who can help them."

Hamm said students are encouraged to attend the meetings at 7 p.m. Thursdays in the Big 12 Room of the Union. She said one of the advantages of being present is learning about the senators in the different colleges.

"We just wanted to let people know how to get involved and give back," Hamm said.

Man posed as minor, has sex tape with child

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PRESCOTT, Ariz. — Authorities investigating a 29-year-old sex offender suspected of repeatedly enrolling in schools as a 12-year-old boy said Thursday they seized a video showing him engaging in sex acts with a child.

Investigators were trying to determine the identity of the juvenile shown in the video with Neil Havens Rodreck II, a convicted sex offender from Oklahoma, said sheriff's spokesman Scott Reed.

Rodreck, who looks youthful, was arrested last week after officials at a school in Chino Valley, about 90 miles northwest of Phoenix, became suspicious when he tried to enroll as a seventh-grader.

CDs, a computer and paperwork also were seized during searches of a Chino Valley home where Rodreck lived with Lonnie Stiffler, 61, Robert Snow, 43, and Brian Jay Nellis, 34.

The four men were arrested Jan. 18, the day after Stiffler, posing as Rodreck's grandfather, allegedly attempted to enroll Rodreck in the Mingus Springs Charter School as 12-year-old "Casey Price."

The sheriff's office said Rodreck conned Stiffler and Snow into believing he was a pre-teen.

All four were charged with conspiracy to commit fraud and conspiracy to commit forgery, and Rodreck, Snow and Nellis were charged with failing to register as sex offenders.

Rodreck also is charged with other counts, including misdemeanor assault for an incident involving a girl. He remains in the Yavapai County jail.

Officials at another school, the Imagine School at Rosefield in the Phoenix suburb of Surprise, said Rodreck attended class August through November before they dropped him for poor attendance. He spent a total of 50 days in class, and apparently did not raise concerns.

Capote might have spent time in Manhattan house

By Elliott Beach
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The house at 1711 Fairchild Ave. is home to three K-State students.

More than 40 years ago, it might have housed author Truman Capote while he wrote his most famous novel, "In Cold Blood."

Melanie Miller, junior in dietetics and nutritional services, said the house has belonged to her family for years, but they didn't know about the potential link to Capote until last year. She said they learned of the possibility from a neighborhood newsletter published in fall 2006.

It is known that Capote came to Manhattan on Nov. 19, 1959 on his way to Garden City, Kan. Four days before, four members of the Clutter family were murdered in their Holcomb, Kan., house.

According to a K-State Libraries article, Capote realized it might be difficult to get members of the small community to speak with him. Capote's editor, Bennett Cerf, had called then-K-State president James McCain and told him he would give him letters to half the people in nearby Garden City, Kan., if Capote spent an evening with the Department of English. Cerf accepted the for Capote, according to the libraries' article.

Capote stayed one night at the Wareham Hotel with his assistant, Harper Lee, author of "To Kill a Mockingbird."

There are rumors that Capote spent more time in Manhattan during the writing of his book, which took nearly six years, and many believe he stayed at 1711 Fairchild Ave during this time.

The house also once belonged to Earl Davis, chairman of the English department, according to the library article. Davis wrote a memoir article in the Manhattan Mercury after Capote died in 1984, but he did not mention Capote's stay at his home in the Mercury article. Additionally, his son, Charles, could not recall his parents mentioning Capote's stay in the home.

The three current residents of the house learned of the possibility of Capote's stay from a neighborhood newsletter in fall 2006.

"We rented the movie 'Capote' after we read the newsletter, but even before we knew that he had stayed here, we thought there was a ghost," Anna Vostrez, junior in mass communications, said.

Vostrez and Miller also live in the house with Ashley

Jones, junior in elementary education.

"Oh, we know there's ghosts; we think it's Truman," Jones said. "Sometimes we hear strange noises and things will disappear, or be misplaced."

"We'll find tweezers have moved from upstairs to down. We just laugh and wave a hand at Truman."

Miller said she would likely advertise the belief when her family sold the house.

"Even if it doesn't raise the value, it is still a fun piece of information to pass on," Miller said.

Kansas residents to honor state's 146th birthday with celebrations

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas residents will celebrate the state's 146th birthday Monday with several events, including a special opening of Manhattan's Goodnow House Museum.

The Goodnow House Museum, 2301 Claflin Road, will have a Kansas Day Open House from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

"I think it's good to commemorate and look back at the beginning of the state and reflect on the period, which was volatile and was significant in national events," said Cheryl Collins, director of the Riley County Historical Museum.

Museum employees will give guided tours during the day in costumes from the period. Museum-goers will be able to try out hands-on history exhibits, Collins said.

"We'll have things you can touch, smell and all of that," she said.

Refreshments will be available, and there will be drawings for Kansas-related books.

The open house is part of a state-wide celebration for Kansas' birthday. Historical sites around the state celebrate Kansas Day, Collins said.

"Our becoming a state was really a pivotal time in the nation," Collins said. "It's a good opportunity to consider not only that, but our history from there forward than today. In my opinion, Kansas has the best history."

Event location include the state capitol and the historical museum in Topeka.

The Kansas History Museum and Library in Topeka will be open from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Monday.

There will be programs, hands-on learning and living history performances, according to the Kansas State Historical Society Web site. While pre-registration is encouraged, admission is free.

Those who visit the capitol building can celebrate with Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, D-Kan.

The building will be open from 9 a.m. to 1 p.m., with Sebelius leading the events at 10 a.m., according to the KSHS Web site.

HOTLINE | Awareness of service could lead to diagnosis, expert says

This makes an avian flu hotline important in Kansas especially because many Kansans, like poultry farmers and recreational hunters, constantly are surrounded by birds, Heideman said.

Since 2003, 159 people died worldwide from avian flu. None of these deaths occurred in North America, and there are no reports of the virus found in birds or any other animal.

Even though there are no reports of the virus in our area, Heideman said it should be on everyone's radar.

"It's something people should remain informed about and be prepared for," he said. "But it's also good to keep in mind that there's no indication that there's anything about to happen."

Heideman said the KDHE is in close contact with Centers for Disease Control, which closely monitors the avian influenza situation, along with the World Health Organization.

Nicolle Wilson, sophomore in secondary education, said avian flu is not something she thinks about regularly.

However, she said it can be a concern for others who deal more with birds, like her brother, who is in environmental studies.

For them, she said, the hotline could be a useful tool.

"If the community is aware of the hotline they could have the ability to maybe predi-nose the avian flu and understand the difference between it and the regular flu," she said.

Staff members from the College of Veterinary Medicine or the KDHE Epidemiological Services Section, depending on the nature of the call, will respond to all calls to the hotline.

A receptionist for the hotline said they have not received any calls thus far.

To contact the avian flu hotline, call (800) 566-4518.

The Brigade trained last fall in Fort Irwin, Calif., for deployment, and learned in November they would be deployed this year. The Brigade is heading to Iraq with their motto, "No mission too difficult and no sacrifice too great," Gibbs said. The phrase came from a World War I captain and years later was adapted into their brigade's motto.

Gibbs said a soldier's job is not easy, and neither is their family's role in the process.

Pfc. Joshua Fulton, 18, said the hardest thing for him is being far away from his family in Los Angeles, Calif. When he was in training at Ft. Irwin, he could not visit his family even though he was only 45 minutes away. This will be Fulton's first tour in Iraq.

"The hardest job is not the soldier's, it is the family of the soldier," Gibbs said.

Brigade Csm. Jim Champagne said his 11-year old son is supportive of his job.

Champagne said his son sat in front of the television during the president's speech and wrote an essay to better understand the president's message.

"It just warms my heart to hear my son say how proud he is of me," Champagne said. "He is very confident in the soldiers."

Champagne already has been to Iraq and says he trusts the Iraq security. He said one of the main obstacles will be the Iraqi soldiers and security trusting in the new soldiers.

"Once they understand we are there to help it should go smoother," he said.

This might be a culture shock to soldiers who are being deployed to Iraq for the first time, Champagne said.

However, they have received extensive cultural training including basic language classes and they are ready, he said.

Champagne said if he could say one thing to President Bush it would be, "We are ready to stay the course."

budget recommendation. It also includes $28.7 million for State General Fund, which would go to student aid and scholarship programs.

The budget recommendations could help K-State maintain the number of students at K-State, Wefald said. The number of high school graduates are going down, which means the number of students going to college are also going down.

"It certainly would allow us to better hold our own," Wefald said. "When we say we're holding our own, it's a good thing."

Nintendo's Wii to provide AP news content

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — Rabid video gamers could get some help keeping in touch with the outside world this weekend as Nintendo Co. launches an online news service through its popular Wii console.

The Wii News Channel, scheduled to debut Saturday, will primarily feature top news stories and photographs from The Associated Press.

Consoles with a broadband Internet connection and the Opera Web browser will be able to access the free news channel, which will offer AP news in multiple languages.

Japanese-language news will come from a separate agency.

There were no immediate plans to sell advertising space, said Perrin Kaplan, vice president for marketing at Nintendo's U.S. headquarters in Redmond.

News will be displayed through an interactive map, to be navigated with the Wii's wireless controller, Kaplan said.

"The beauty of it is it zooms in and out of areas of the world," she said. "So if you really want to focus on regional news or national news versus international, you just blow up the map of the U.S."

The AP has a two-year contract to provide news and photos to Nintendo and would like to provide multimedia in the future, said Jane Seagrave, vice president of new media markets for the New York-based news cooperative.

"It's a very innovative new application of what we're doing generally, which is to try to get our content to new audiences on new platforms," Seagrave said.

The AP will supply news for the Wii in English, French, Spanish, Dutch, German, and Swiss-German, Seagrave said.

The Japanese news company Goo will supply Nintendo's Japanese-language news, Kaplan said. Terms of the deal were not disclosed.

The Wii has been a surprise hit for Nintendo as it competes with Sony Corp.'s PlayStation 3 and Microsoft Corp.'s Xbox 360 consoles.

A recent report from the market research firm NPD Group said the Wii has sold 1.1 million units since it was released in the U.S. on Nov. 19, with 604,200 of those units sold in December.

"The Nintendo Wii demographic is definitely a wider demographic than your traditional hardcore gamer," said Billy Pidgeon, a video game industry analyst at IDC in New York. "It kind of makes sense for other types of content to be made available on the Wii."

Nintendo isn't the only company hoping to offer more from video game consoles with online connections.

Ford looks to recover from record losses

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DEARBORN, Mich. — With big red numbers on its balance sheet that amount to $1,925 for every car and truck it sold last year, one has to wonder if Ford Motor Co. has the money to keep the doors open long enough for its restructuring plan to take hold.

On Thursday, the 103-year-old industrial icon reported a staggering $12.7 billion loss for 2006, and it warned losses would continue this year and next. The loss was the largest in Ford history, driven by slumping North American sales and $9.9 billion in special items, including restructuring costs tied to the planned closure of 16 plants.

Chief Executive Alan Mulally, who is leading the massive remaking of the storied automaker, is confident in its plan to return to profitability by sometime in 2009.

But some industry analysts, while impressed by Ford's cost-cutting efforts, are skeptical that its new product lineup can carry the company that invented the assembly line back into the black.

"We know where we are. We are dealing with it and we're on plan," Mulally told reporters and industry analysts in a conference call after the numbers were announced.

Although huge, Ford's losses were far from the largest annual corporate deficits on record; Time Warner Inc. reported a $97.2 billion loss in 2002, largely due to new accounting rules about how to value assets. Ford could not rely on accounting rules, however, to explain its total.

Ford's loss also wasn't the worst annual total in the auto industry. General Motors Corp. lost $23.4 billion in 1992, due mainly to accounting rule changes on health care liabilities.

The whopping 2006 loss surpassed Ford's old record of $7.39 billion set in 1992. It amounted to $6.79 per share versus a profit of $1.44 billion, or 77 cents a share, in 2005. The company also reported losing $5.8 billion in the fourth quarter and $6 billion on its North American operations.

Several analysts said the loss was not surprising, given Ford's high costs and falling market share and sales. Ford's future is cloudy at best, given the deficit that it must overcome, analysts said.

"They have a massive challenge in front of them. Their basic business is billions of dollars in the red," said Burnham Securities analyst David Healy.

Ford is banking on the restructuring to pull it through the next two years. Mulally, hired from aerospace giant Boeing Co., is leading the drastic efforts to turn around the company.

Ford mortgaged its assets to borrow up to $23.4 billion to pay for the restructuring and to cover losses expected until 2009. About 38,000 hourly workers have signed up for buyout or early retirement offers, and Ford plans to cut its white-collar work force by 14,000 with buyouts and early retirements.

Chief Financial Officer Don Leclair said Ford expects favorable results from its automotive business in 2007.

But because of interest on its debt, "total automotive results are expected to be worse in 2007 than in 2006," he said.

Leclair said the company finished 2006 with $33.9 billion in cash available for its automotive operations, including $12 billion that it borrowed in December. He said the company could tap into nearly all of that cash to fund its operations.

The company is on target, though, to achieve its goal of cutting $5 billion in annual costs by 2008 compared with 2005 levels, Leclair said.

Mulally said Ford will continue to review its costs, looking for more cuts as it gains efficiencies from building more cars worldwide on fewer frames in more efficient factories.

"The more I review the details, the more confident I am that we can continue that cost reduction through 2009 and beyond," he said.

While the cost cuts may work, it's the revenue side that worries some analysts, and revenue is driven by new products. Ford has promised that 70 percent of its cars and trucks would be new or significantly updated by the end of 2008. It is rolling out the new Edge crossover and plans new F-series Super Duty pickups, a new Focus small car and an updated Five Hundred large sedan by the end of the year.

But Pete Hastings, an auto industry corporate bonds analyst with Morgan Keegan & Co. Inc. in Memphis, Tenn., said he is among those who are skeptical of the new products.

"I don't see much that helps Ford," he said. "There may be one or two offerings that are newsworthy or that make a splash, but it's not enough to lift the overall company."

Ford said it expects to burn up $10 billion in cash to run its business through 2009 and spend another $7 billion to invest in new products.

Excluding special items, Ford lost $1.50 per share in all of 2006, worse than Wall Street predicted. Fourteen analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expected a loss of $1.35 per share for the year, excluding special items.

Still, the company's shares rose 2 cents, or 0.24 percent, to $8.22 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Ford, which has relied on truck and sport utility vehicle sales for much of its profit, was hurt last year as $3-per-gallon gasoline sent consumers fleeing to smaller, more fuel-efficient vehicles. Ford has seen its market share deteriorate in recent years. At the same time, Toyota Motor Corp. has seen its U.S. sales rise, beating Ford out for the No. 2 sales spot in July and November.

Sales for the fourth quarter fell to $40.3 billion from $46.3 billion a year ago. Annual sales dropped to $160.1 billion from $176.9 billion in 2005.

Even though all the numbers look bad at the moment, Healy predicted that Ford eventually will become marginally profitable.

But as far as investing in the company, he's a little leery.

"My opinion is I'd just as soon watch it from the sidelines," Healy said.

Bush to propose voucher reform

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Up to 180,000 additional low-income families could get housing assistance under a proposal by President Bush to remove caps on the number of housing vouchers distributed by local agencies, Housing Secretary Aphonso Jackson said Thursday.

Bush, as part of his 2008 budget proposal, will offer a plan to free up unspent money already in the hands of local housing authorities by encouraging them to issue more vouchers that low-income families use to pay rent. Bush administration officials estimated that housing authorities across the country are sitting on more than $1 billion that they cannot spend because they have already issued the maximum number of Section 8 housing vouchers that they are allowed.

"The reforms proposed in the president's upcoming budget will create innovative solutions that could help 180,000 more families receive the housing assistance they need," said Jackson, secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development. "Because many housing authorities around the nation have been good stewards of the taxpayers dollars, we will be able to put a roof over the heads of more people in those communities."

Many housing authorities have built up reserves by negotiating favorable rents with private landlords.

However, housing authorities that spend down their reserves on additional vouchers would not necessarily be guaranteed more money in future years to continue funding those vouchers.

Democrats in Congress have complained for years that the Section 8 program relies on an outdated formula that sends money to housing authorities that don't spend it while shortchanging those that need it, said Steve Adamske, spokesman for Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., chairman of the House Committee on Financial Services, which has jurisdiction over housing matters.

Adamske said the cap on housing vouchers is only part of a bigger problem with the overall spending formula.

New York City Housing Commissioner Sean Donovan said the proposed changes would enable him to issue up to 3,500 new housing vouchers. Donovan said his agency, which issues only a portion of the housing vouchers in New York, is currently capped at about 27,000 vouchers.

"We have been actively encouraging the administration to lift this cap," Donovan said. "We do have money that we could spend if this cap is removed."

The Bush proposal would encourage local housing authorities to issue more vouchers by reducing their budgets in future years if they don't spend down reserves. Also, federal funding for the administrative budgets of local housing authorities would be based in part on the number of vouchers they issue, a senior HUD official said on condition of anonymity. The official requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the record.

HUD's Section 8 housing program funds housing vouchers for more than 2 million low-income families. The vouchers are distributed by the nation's 2,400 local housing agencies.

Bush is scheduled to unveil his budget proposal for fiscal year 2008 on Feb. 5. It will be the first time he proposes a budget to a Democratic-controlled Congress.

Bush will propose a $16 billion budget for the Section 8 program in the 2008 budget year, which begins Oct. 1, the HUD official said. Current spending on the program is about $15.1 billion.

Interracial couples deal with societal pressures, life in the military

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Today is Robert Cunha and Shaniell Johnson's wedding day. However, there will be no dress, no cake and no walking down the aisle.

Johnson, junior in family studies and human services, had been planning a wedding ceremony. Instead she attended a different type of ceremony: deployment.

Cunha, a specialist at Fort Riley, said the couple will wait until he returns from Iraq to have their wedding.

"It is hard being a student on the army's schedule and not being able to plan my wedding as I would like to, but I made the choice of marrying a soldier," Johnson said.

Cunha said they are marrying before he deploys because they want their relationship to be official so she can contact him if something were to happen overseas.

"If, God forbid, I go to war and not come back," Cunha said, "I want a little piece of what life has to give."

DEALING WITH DISTANCE

Cunha, who already has been to Iraq once, said relationships can make or break a soldier's confidence.

"If your relationship can make it through deployment then you can go through anything in life together," he said.

He said one of the hardest things is not having face-to-face conversations. Military relationships also tend to move quickly, which is why he proposed after five months of dating.

Johnson balances a full-time job as a certified nursing assistant at Stoney-Brook nursing home and a full class load.

"I just have to learn how to manage time," she said.

Usually, she said she studies, takes an hour break to spend time with Cunha and then goes back to studying.

"Time is priceless," he said.

Johnson said she will take the first week in February to be with Cunha before his deployment, which they don't have an exact date for.

OVERLOOKING PREJUDICE

As if the deployment hasn't put enough strain on their relationship, Johnson, who is black, and Cunha, who is Portuguese-American, said they felt people judge them as a couple because they are interracial.

Though people sometimes stare or make comments, they said they try not to let it affect their relationship.

"People look at us like we shouldn't be together," Cunha said.

Cunha, who grew up in a diverse neighborhood outside of Washington, D.C., said he never considered race when choosing who to date.

"Where I'm from, it's like, if you're ugly, you're ugly; if you're cute, you're cute," he said.

Johnson, whose family is from New Orleans, said he grew up in mostly white schools and for the most part had white friends.

She said many of her friends don't mind that she is dating outside of her race as long as she is happy.

The couple said they grew closer after Johnson found her grandfather, a Hurricane Katrina evacuee, dead at her parents' home in Topeka.

"(Cunha) was the first person I called, he comforted me in a time of need," she said.

From then on, they were inseparable, she said.

"I couldn't imagine spending the rest of life with someone else," Johnson said. "We are so compatible in so many different ways. Of course we argue, like a typical relationship, but five minutes later we are not mad anymore."

IGNORING RACE

Unlike Cunha and Johnson, Jay Baker, who is a first lieutenant at Fort Riley, and Laura Heck, graduate student in school counseling, said they have not experienced racial discrimination as an interracial couple.

They said they never notice if people look at them because they don't think about their relationship as interracial.

Baker, who is black, and Heck, who is white, said they came from very different backgrounds.

Baker grew up in St. Louis, Mo., and Heck is from Minneapolis, Kan.

"Our relationship is based off of personality," Baker said.

Baker and Heck have been dating since October and said they consider themselves serious.

"We are taking it day by day," Baker said.

He said he never has taken race into consideration when deciding who to date.

"I have dated almost every ethnicity," he said, looking at his girlfriend as she laughed.

She said although some people might not agree with their relationship, it doesn't bother her.

"I think it is just unthinkable how Specialist Robert Cunha and Shaniell Johnson, junior in family studies and human services, had their wedding planned until Cunha's deployment date was moved up.

some people would try to judge us because we are interracial. There are so many other parts to a person other than race," she said.

GROWING FROM CHANGE

For Todd Hergert, junior in finance, and Patrice Wilson, junior in business administration, their cultural differences make them stronger.

The two said they believe the military community is more accepting of interracial relationships than civilians.

"We both grew up in military families and interracial relationships are acceptable," Wilson said.

Hergert, an ROTC cadet at K-State, said when he graduates it is likely that he will be sent to war.

Wilson said she grew up as a military brat and lived around more minorities and foreigners than whites.

"I know I can deal with the emotional stress because I have gone through this my whole life in my family, I already know what to expect," she said.

Wilson said since most interracial couples usually include a white female and a black male, some people do not take she and Hergert seriously because she is black and he is white.

"When I first told my friends I was with a white guy they didn't believe me," she said. "They were like, 'are you serious?'"

Wilson said she thinks some of the shock value that used to be associated with interracial couples is now placed upon gay couples.

She said although she and Hergert sometimes receive dirty looks, they believe interracial relationships are becoming a norm in society.

"People have gotten over the controversy and we are accepted by general society," Wilson said.

Soundtrack offers good variety

Music from 'Marie Antoinette' includes eclectic range that creates vivid score capturing new, old styles alike

The "Marie Antoinette" soundtrack reminds me of high school, making mixed tapes to listen to in the car. I would pair the most eclectic and random music along with stuff on the radio and some of my old favorites.

The mixes would have a theme, whether it was "summer fun" or "I'm sad." They were, in a way, the soundtracks to my life.

This album serves the same purpose. It has music of varying genres which entertain, and in tune with the movie give the feelings of a girl growing up in the French court of the 1700s. Still, it conveys the same wants and needs of teenagers today.

Listening to a soundtrack of a movie about Marie Antoinette, one might be a bit skeptical. Usually period films include classical tunes — not to say I don't enjoy a little Beethoven or Mozart now and then, but let's face it, too much can get boring.

This soundtrack is so much more than just period music. It does include some beautiful opera — such as "Tristes Apprets" — as well as some classic Scarlatti and Vivaldi pieces. These tracks, with the lilting strings of violins and the sharp notes of harpsichords, add depth to the album.

It brings the listener back to the time when the movie was set.

On the flip side, a lot of the soundtrack is from the last few decades with artists like The Banishes, Bow Wow Wow and Adam & the Ant. These add a lightness to the soundtrack and almost a "high school" feel, but not in a bad way.

They reflect the subject of the movie, Marie Antoinette herself, the teenage queen of France.

Overall, the album is fabulous. It offers a wide range of music both new, retro and really old — like 1700s old.

Although some classical pieces might turn heads, the mixture offers something for everyone, and in my case, offers everything I need.

Comedy for charity

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The inaugural Phi Delta Theta comedy night will be at 8 p.m. Saturday in Umberger 105.

The main act is comedian Steve Hofstetter, original columnist for collegelhumor.com. Tickets are $5 and are available for purchase from any active Phi Delta Theta member.

Tickets also can be purchased at the K-State Student Union Friday and Umberger the night of the show.

The event, a philanthropy for the ALS Association, funds Lou Gehrig's disease research. Gehrig was a Phi Delt at Columbia University.

Steve Hofstetter, also known as the "thinking man's comic," writes for Sports Illustrated. He has a Top 20 comedy album and is in the middle of a tour that takes him to college campuses and comedy venues around the nation. Hofstetter will be available after the show to sign copies of his two books.

RCPD reports recent death as homicide

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department discovered the body of a 21-year-old male in a residence in northeastern Manhattan early Saturday morning and believe it to be a homicide.

Officers identified the victim as Terrel Morris, 1369 Flint Hills Place, after they responded to a 911 call reporting an injured man inside the home at 4:30 a.m., according to a press release.

In the release, the RCPD said the circumstances of the death are unclear, and they have no more information at this point.

Lawmakers, lobbyists express concern over school funds

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, Kan. — An 'unprecedented three-year, $466 million boost to school funding approved last year might have been enough to satisfy the Kansas Supreme Court, but school lobbyists and some lawmakers are far from happy with the deal.

Legislators from wealthy districts say the funding increase is unfair to them, while supporters of smaller districts say the wealthy districts came out much better than those in less-populated, poorer areas.

Kathy Cook, executive director of Kansas Families United for Public Education, which lobbied for funding increases, said there still are "unresolved issues" in the school finance plan.

"It is simply because legislators put together a plan based on politics and not the actual costs of educating students," Cook said.

The funding increase was in response to a state Supreme Court ruling that the school finance system was underfunded and unfairly distributed.

Outgoing Saudi Ambassador speaks of diplomacy

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Sept. 11 attacks caused a rift in the long, storied relationship between Saudi Arabia and the United States, said the outgoing Saudi Arabian ambassador to the United States in the 147th Landon Lecture Friday in McCain Auditorium.

Prince Turki al-Faisal said the relationship between Saudi Arabia and the United States dates back to Saudi King Abdul Aziz and U.S. President Franklin Roosevelt.

After the discovery of oil in the Middle East, Saudi Arabia was inundated with offers to deal for oil from many world powers including England and France. But the kingdom of Saudi Arabia chose to deal with the United States, due to the lack of U.S. colonialism, al-Faisal said.

Roosevelt and Aziz became friends and wrote letters to each other, beginning a long history with the United States.

"Roosevelt even gave Aziz one of his wheelchairs," al-Faisal said.

The friendship remained strong until Sept. 11, when mistrust and misperceptions between the two countries and the rest of the world arose.

"It was a horrible period of time," al-Faisal said. "It was ugly for both sides."

Members from both sides started a focus group to promote person-to-person exchanges, called the U.S.-Saudi Strategic Dialogue, he said.

Relations between the two countries improved when people from the United States and Saudi Arabia began to meet each other and not see each other as stereotypes, al-Faisal said.

"It is worth it every time a Saudi talks with an American," he said.

In addition to this group, Saudi Arabia changed its outward approach to combat misperceptions, by encouraging Saudi students to attend American universities, among other things, he said.

More than 10,000 Saudi students were offered full scholarships to attend colleges and universities in the United States and the rest of the world, and currently more than 12,000 Saudis attend schools in the United States, he said.

Due to this exchange, the Saudi people are able to explain that the speeches of certain evangelical preachers are the words of a minority, and the views of certain clerics aren't the views of the entire Saudi people.

"This is the view of one fanatical cleric," he said.

The problems with misperceptions, both on the part of the United States and Saudi Arabia, decreased when students were able to come to the United States and meet people

Rodeo mixes bull riding, humor in memory of K-State alum

Josh Coronet, Garden City resident, competes in the final round of the fourth-annual Brett Cushenberry Memorial Bullriding Competition Saturday night in Weber Arena.

Cowboy hats and belt buckles were plentiful at the Fourth Annual Brett Cushenberry Memorial Bull Ride on Saturday.

Thirty bull riders and five freestyle bullfighters competed in front of more than 100 students, residents and family members at Weber Arena in Weber Hall.

The highlight of the night for many occurred when Dusty Tuckness, a professional freestyle bullfighter, executed a back flip over a charging bull.

Although two-time freestyle bullfighting world champion Wacey Munsell was the biggest name at the event, the crowd cheered for Tuckness, and he performed another bullfight to close the event.

Freestyle bullfighting is a 70-second competition where the bullfighter avoids the bull by means of dodging, jumping and using a barrel. The fighters' ability to remain close to the bull without losing their footing determines scoring, according to the professional bull riding Web site.

The event honors the life of Brett Cushenberry, former K-State student and rodeo team member for three years. Cushenberry was trampled by a bull on Oct. 12, 2003, at the Cowboy's Professional Rodeo Association Finals in Hutchinson, Kan. He died two days later of heart complications.

A.J. Griffin, K-State alumnus, started the event four years ago in Cushenberry's honor.

"It's getting bigger and bigger every year," Griffin said. "I thought it was pretty excellent to see everyone in attendance."

Several students from the K-State rodeo club and many different majors were among those who attended the event.

"It was pretty good," Josh Woellhof, senior in agronomy, said. "It was the first time I got the chance to come out, and it was pretty neat watching the bullfighting."

Meredith Holland, K-State Miss Rodeo and senior in women's studies, said the memorial competition begins a year of events for the K-State Rodeo Club. Holland, as part of her title, travels across Kansas to promote K-State and the sport of rodeo.

"(The event) is nice for me, because I don't have to travel very far, and we get a lot of the students, which makes it a lot of fun," she said. "It really encourages people in the university to come out and see what we are all about."

Between rides, funny man Doug Munsell, Wacey's father, provided some comic relief. He mixed traditional rodeo clown props with current and personal issues ranging from marriage to the hip-hop culture.

Bizarre, funny and unusual stories from across the world

HELICOPTER BLOWS DEER OFF ICY LAKE

NORMAN, Okla. — The pilot of a TV news helicopter used the wind from the aircraft's rotor to push a stranded deer to safety after it lost its footing on a frozen lake and couldn't get up.

A small crowd gathered to watch the deer struggling, its hooves repeatedly slipping, near the shore of Lake Thunderbird at about 4 p.m. Jan. 17.

With the helicopter's camera rolling, KWTN pilot Mason Dunn used the wind from the rotor to push the deer, sending it into a break in the ice where the animal managed to hold onto the ice with its front legs.

Dunn then lowered the helicopter and the wind sent the deer sliding on its belly across the ice until it reached shore and scampered into the nearby woods.

VODKA-SIPPING JUROR CAUSES MISTRIAL

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — A judge ordered a new trial in a case in which a juror sipped vodka throughout the trial.

Jefferson County Circuit Judge Geoffrey Morris said in his order that new trials may be granted only in the most extreme circumstances.

But, he said, "the inexcusable, disruptive behavior of this juror was so extraordinary as to render this relief appropriate."

The case involved a lawsuit brought by a woman who claimed she was injured when a garbage truck ran into her car.

The jury foreman told Morris the juror had been uncooperative during deliberations, and eventually became so inebriated she could not participate.

After the verdict came in, Morris discovered the clear liquid the woman had been sipping all day from a plastic water bottle was vodka.

He dismissed her from jury duty and made her husband come to pick her up. She was not named in the court's order and was not sanctioned.

TULSA TO DIG UP CAR BURIED FOR 50 YEARS

TULSA, Okla. — Organizers of a coming-out party for a buried 1957 Plymouth Belvedere could use some help.

The car, which was buried in brand-new condition under the lawn of the Tulsa County Courthouse in 1957, is scheduled to be unearthed June 15 as part of the Oklahoma Centennial.

Promoters are looking for people who helped lower the car into its crypt in 1957 to perhaps shed some light on what to expect when the car is unearthed.

There is speculation the car might have turned into a pile of rust, or that it is in pristine condition and worth thousands of dollars.

Sharon King Davis, who chaired Tulsa's centennial efforts, looked at photos of the people responsible for burying the car in 1957 and found her grandfather.

"I wish grandpa had left me some instructions," she told the Tulsa World.

The car was largely forgotten until Davis and her group started work on the centennial. Files on the car have vanished, but what's known is the car is on a steel pallet with jacks under the axles.

"There's a kind of Rip Van Winkle reaction," Davis says. "Most people had long ago forgotten the buried car, but as the time to dig it up nears, they are waking up and wondering about life in 1957."

When the car was buried, a contest was announced to award it and a $100 savings account to the person who came closest to guessing Tulsa's population in 2007.

Organizers concede finding that person or his or her heirs might not be easy.

At the time, the guesses were recorded on microfilm and sealed in a steel container buried with the car.

A COLD ONE FOR MAN'S BEST FRIEND

AMSTERDAM, Netherlands — After a long day hunting, there's nothing like wrapping your paw around a cold bottle of beer.

So Terrie Berenden, a pet shop owner in the southern Dutch town of Zelhem, created a beer for her Weimaraners made from beef extract and malt.

"Once a year we go to Austria to hunt with our dogs, and at the end of the day we sit on the veranda and drink a beer. So we thought, my dog also has earned it," she said.

Berenden consigned a local brewery to make and bottle the nonalcoholic beer, branded as Kwispelbier. It was introduced to the market last week and advertised as "a beer for your best friend."

"Kwispel" is the Dutch word for wagging a tail.

The beer is fit for human consumption, Berenden said. But at $2.14 (or 1.65 euro) a bottle, it's about four times more expensive than a Heineken.

this film dispels the stigma of the common but little-discussed experience of abortion by presenting the stories of diverse women and the filmmaker's own "abortion diaries" to create an honest, intimate and at times surprisingly funny "dinner party" where you get to hear what women say behind closed doors about sex, love, work, motherhood, spirituality and their won bodies.

Growing number of men seek salon cuts, services

By Nicole Johnston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kirby Chapman, professor of mechanical engineering, said he never thought of going to a salon.

Chapman said he went to a barbershop for years until he met his wife, who introduced him to the world of salon care.

Chapman is part of a growing number of men drawn to salons, a place of highlighted hairdos and pampering services.

It's been nearly three decades since Chapman became a salon client, and he said he barely remembers what it was like before the salon.

Even though his visits are strictly for haircuts, Chapman said he can see the difference.

"I feel like I get a better haircut," Chapman said. "What really counts, though, is how it looks when it grows out."

Adam Johnson, senior in horticultural design, said his best experience at a salon was his first visit.

After going to a barbershop for seven years, Johnson said he did not expect warm towels or the scalp massage he received with his haircut.

But Johnson said he does not frequent the salon solely for a haircut — he also goes to get a tan. As a K-State yell leader, Johnson said it is important for him to look his best.

"They don't make us go tanning, but we do have to maintain a clean cut," he said. "We call it the 'pretty-boy look,' shaven with a clean haircut."

Daniel Billet, author of the article "Eight Reasons to Get Your Haircut at a Salon vs. a Barbershop," wrote that "a good haircut and style is obvious, which shows you have some effort into your personal appearance."

He also wrote that men can get more help by trained cosmetologists at salons rather than a quick cut at a barbershop.

Even though Chapman and Johnson enjoy getting haircuts at the salon, they both said some services still make them hesitant, including massages, facials and waxing.

Kate Waller, manager at GAIA Salon, 421 Poyntz Ave., said her salon encourages men to visit its salon. The salon runs specials for couples' massages, especially around Valentine's Day to encourage more men to visit. Facials are also a popular service for men, Waller said.

Allisa Schurle, stylist for Studio 32, dries the hair of Adam B. Johnson, senior in horticultural design, Friday afternoon at the salon. Johnson said he gets his hair cut at salons regularly.

"Although a facial can be a little intimidating, I think that, no matter what your skin type is, a facial can benefit anybody, whether you are a man or a woman," she said.

"It's one of our most relaxing services."

For those who want to try out a salon service, Johnson gave this piece of advice: "Go for it. It's just like any barber shop, just more girls, and you can't ever go wrong with more girls. Guys want to look good, too."

Arts Center features 'Love Letters' as part of staged reading series

By Ben Hedges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An older couple sits at an illuminated table at center stage. Without looking at one another, they read letters from two lovers that span their entire lives from childhood until old age.

The reading was part of the Manhattan Arts Center's "Hear and Now," staged reading series.

"Love Letters," the 31st entry in the series, played Sunday night at the arts center to a small audience.

The play, directed by Paul Berger, is a love story told through letters written back and forth between Andy Ladd and Melissa Gardner. Their personalities sit on opposite ends of the spectrum, yet they continue to have a connection through the letters they write.

"This is a unique show because it's just two people reading letters," said Berger, who also plays the voice of Andy's letters.

Mary Elizabeth Atwood, who does the voice of Melissa, said one of the messages of the play is to live in the moment.

"It makes you think about what happens when you have missed opportunities," Atwood said.

Through the characters' lives they take different routes, meeting up time and time again.

Though Andy and Melissa have their own careers and families, their love for one another never quite extinguishes and a meeting late in their lives turns into an affair, sending their lives into chaos.

Neither actor makes any physical actions until the end of the play when, upon Melissa's death, Atwood turns to Berger and becomes the spirit of her character, consoling him as he reads his final letter of condolence.

Molly Hoss, senior in biology, said she was interested in how unusual the play was.

"I thought it was an interesting take on how to present a play," Hoss said.

She said it was easy to relate to the moments in some of the letters.

"I could see it happening with me and my boyfriend in our early years," she said.

This was the only presentation of "Love Letters" at the arts center, but Paul Berger said it is a play anyone should see if they have the chance.

"It's a beautiful yet sad story," Berger said. "And at some times, it can even be exhilarating."

Paul Berger, director, and Mary Elizabeth Atwood, both of Manhattan, perform in the line reading of "Love Letters" at the Manhattan Art Center on Sunday evening.

TO THE POINT Tackle issues now before they cause a blowup

Race and sexuality are two monumental issues of our time. It would be nice if we could talk about them without collapsing into fork-tongued tirades.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

When "Grey's Anatomy" actor Isaiah Washington let slip his now infamous anti-gay slur at last week's Golden Globes, we promptly were treated to the bared fangs of the indignant and the clumsy apologies of actors, now well-aware that the sky was about to come crashing down.

The editorial staff understands the offense of these words, but when such contentious subjects are only broached as they explode in our faces, it seems society's discourse is absent some key elements. If we are teetering on the verge of blowing up, it is because no one is talking.

We know someone, somewhere, has concocted a scheme of what is not acceptable. What we do not know is why the opinions of a few are given the floor while other concerns are deemed unspeakable. If the concerns are nonsense, let them be exposed as nonsense.

Second, mere use of the English language requires the grasping of a set of norms with double and even triple standards. A steady flow of "Do as I say, not as I do" has clogged any sort of dialogue process.

A current proposed ordinance in Brazoria, Texas, would create a $500 fine for using the "n-word" unless used as a term of endearment. Such absurdity only illustrates the desperation to avoid the issue.

We can't dodge these bullets forever, and if we do not address these issues, they will only get worse.

Lights, cameras, lobby

Hollywood honors films with agendas rather than what viewers like

It's finally happened. The leftist Hollywood pinheads managed to isolate themselves so much and give themselves so many awards that I don't think they even know what they're doing anymore.

RYAN SPENCER

In Wednesday's Wall Street Journal, a large article detailed the plight of Paramount Studio. The studio execs were shocked — shocked I tell you — to receive 19 Academy Award nominations. They were shocked because their studio has some of the lowest box-office numbers in the business.

How could this be? Surely if the Academy loves its films, the American public should too, right? Apparently not. That, ladies and gentlemen, is where politics comes in.

Paramount was sure instant classics like "Dreamgirls," "Babel" and "An Inconvenient Truth" were box-office gold.

What they didn't count on is the fact that no one wants to see Eddie Murphy in a horrible wig, a grossly confusing Brad Pitt movie, or worse, Al Gore talking for 90 minutes.

Hollywood has become so engrossed with itself it has forgotten it's supposed to be making films for the average person, not Greenpeace or the American Civil Liberties Union.

I've long been a supporter of giving the Best Picture award to the highest-grossing box-office movie. If that's how the film industry did it, movies like "Pirates of the Caribbean," "Harry Potter" and "Lord of the Rings" would have received the respect they deserve. Instead, the Academy gives, or at least considers giving, awards to bombs like "Crash," "Million Dollar Baby," "Brokeback Mountain" and "The Aviator."

The movie industry is so disconnected with the American public that it doesn't bother making movies people enjoy anymore; they would rather spend time and money making a movie pushing a political agenda. Why else would Michael Moore's "Fahrenheit 9/11" be so highly touted? The leftists thought they finally were going to expose the evil Bush administration for what it truly is. Instead, Big Mike was exposed for what he really is: an over-rated, pompous nobody who has no regard for fact or accuracy.

You and I don't go to movies to be lectured on the finer points of global warming or have stereotypes of diversity shoved down our throats.

We watch "Casino Royale" because Bond takes out the bad guy and "Borat" because it's funny as hell.

When Mel Gibson independently made "The Passion of the Christ," Hollywood producers and critics thought he was crazy, while church congregations across the country turned out in hundreds of millions to see it. Still, the left coast didn't catch on to the fact that the hugely conservative Christian base in this country doesn't want to see "Blow" or "21 Grams."

So are things going to shift from producer to consumer? Not likely, considering the next big winner to be lifted up is the Sundance Film Festival Grand Jury winner, "Hounddog," which features a rape scene with 12-year-old Dakota Fanning. Fun, huh?

My suggestion is to keep going to the movies you want to see, however few and far apart they are. If you really care about what the Academy thinks are "winners," by all means, keep paying to see "The Queen."

Hollywood is going to keep producing whatever films it thinks are best to keep America cultured. As for me, I'm waiting for the Halo movie.

Brownback's values infringe on minority rights, support unattainable 'cultural values'

Two words give me nightmares — or rather, night terrors. Two simple words make me want to get a plane ticket to France: President Brownback.

Not only those words, but the ideals he stands for, make me want to run from here as far and as fast as I can.

He is facing at least 10 GOP contenders, but most people dismiss his campaign at the get-go. That's a mistake.

Kansas' very own Sen. Sam Brownback is a smart man. He's no George Bush and no Dick Cheney.

Where Dick Cheney seems to be all malice and George Bush seems to be single-minded, Brownback speaks simply and eloquently about "a culture of life."

According to The Associated Press, Brownback said he is "a full-scale Ronald Reagan conservative."

That's all good, but anyone who focuses on rebuilding families and building up the nation's cultural values makes me wary.

Whose cultural values is he going to build up? California's? New York's? Alabama's? This country is too varied and too large to have one cultural value.

The United States is composed of Muslims, Christians, Jews and other groups. We have homosexual, heterosexual and other variations of people. There are people here from Mexico, England, Russia, Saudi Arabia and everywhere.

When someone starts talking about building up values and protecting marriage as a union between one man and one woman, I get nervous.

This country was built on the notion of protecting the minority from the views of the majority. People have their own views, and they need to be respected.

It is not the place of the president or anyone in government to legislate morality unless someone is being harmed.

Morality is based upon a person's views and upbringing. It is a matter of a person's individuality, and individuality should be respected, not punished by making everyone alike and legislating the way they believe or feel.

Morality, individuality and cultural values aren't and shouldn't be the same for everyone. That would nullify the meaning of individuality.

Sam Brownback is a smart man. He should realize his views aren't the views of the entire nation, or even a large part of the United States.

No matter how you disguise it, taking away rights is still the taking away of personal liberties, and plain speaking or saying you are a Ronald Reagan conservative doesn't change that.

Although most of the media attention has focused on Democratic senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, they aren't the only contenders in this race. Sam Brownback is there, and he is a force to be reckoned with.

People would do well to remember that.

SHIITE-SUNNI CLASHES CAN REIGNITE WAR IN LEBANON

THE NEW YORK TIMES

It is good that international donors have pledged $7.6 billion to help rebuild Lebanon after last summer's Israeli air strikes. The democratically elected government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora needs all the help it can get. Clashes between Shiite supporters of Hezbollah and the government's mainly Sunni supporters threaten to overwhelm Siniora's fragile coalition.

If not contained, they could reignite Lebanon's catastrophic civil war. Lebanon's fundamental problem is the archaic political system dividing the country's top offices among rival religious communities. Lebanon's large and impoverished Shiite minority, long a significant loser in this system, has increasingly radicalized — straight into the arms of Hezbollah.

Hezbollah has a political party in Parliament, political gangsters on Beirut's streets and a heavily armed militia whose attacks on Israel provoked last summer's destruction.

That's why the Bush administration needs to drop its stubborn resistance to diplomacy with Syria — and try to coax Damascus away from both Iran and Hezbollah.

DIABETIC TAKES CONDITION MORE SERIOUSLY

THE TOPEKA CAPITAL JOURNAL

If I ever find the time to write a memoir of my life as a diabetic, I have a great title lined up — "I Want Candy." Not only is it the title of a great little ditty from the '80s, but it's also an apt description of some of my struggles.

Last week as I returned to teaching, I began class by telling my students I was a "recovering diabetic."

For much of 2006, I pretended I wasn't diabetic. I didn't check my sugars, I didn't take my medicine with any regularity, and I mostly ate whatever I wanted. However, I couldn't fool my body. Diabetes never forgets.

I'm still diabetic and barring some amazing medical breakthrough, I'll remain a diabetic all my life. Forrest Gump's mama was right. Life is like a box of chocolates, it's sweet, tasty and always leaves you wanting more.

PRICING SCHOOLS SHOULD BE LIKE PRICING CARS

THE ST. PETERSBURG TIMES

They used to be called "students," entering the classroom pulling out notebooks. The Bush administration prefers to call them "customers."

"Student" implies a process of growth, of gaining expertise over time and effort. A "customer" enjoys a fully formed state of empowerment.

In the interests of "customer" service, Margaret Spellings, U.S. Secretary of Education, convened a panel to consider whether colleges and universities were delivering value for money.

Buying higher education should be like buying a vehicle, she said.

You go online; you compare prices. "This same transparency and ease should be the case when families shop for colleges, especially when one year of college can cost more than a car."

Spellings wants to create a database of an institution's achievements. To address the question famously posed by the president — "Is our children learning?" — she wants to impose standardized tests. As former Gov. Jeb Bush was fond of saying, "We measure because we care."

KANSAS DAY

John Brown

Distinguished Kansans made their marks

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

James Langston Hughes
1902 - 1967

Today, Kansas celebrates 146 years of statehood. Those years are filled with a history including dozens of players. Kansans have succeeded in numerous fields, including politics, music, education and entrepreneurship.

Figures such as Dwight D. Eisenhower and Amelia Earhart are well-known, but some people overlook other influential Kansans.

Hughes lived, for most of his childhood, in Topeka and Lawrence. Hughes was one of America's best-known poets. One of his most famous pieces, "Not Without Laughter," was a novel about a boy who grew up in a small town in Kansas.

Hughes

1800 - 1859

Brown played a significant role in Kansas history as an abolitionist. He settled his family in Franklin County, southwest of Osawatomie, Kan. Brown, who did not come to Kansas until he was 55 years old, became involved in the war against slavery in Kansas and Missouri.

Charlie "Yardbird" Parker
1920 - 1955

Born in Kansas City, Kan., Parker quickly became part of the jazz scene, famous for playing his alto saxophone.

Parker had an innovative style, which later became a form of bebop.

Charlie "Yardbird" Parker

Kay McFarland

Blackbear Bosin
1921 - 1980

After moving to Wichita in 1940, Bosin began his career as an artist at Western Lithograph and as an illustrator for Boeing Aircraft. A man of Kiowa-Comanche heritage, Bosin's most famous piece is a sculpture of an American Indian called "Keeper of the Plains," located in Wichita.

Bosin

Hattie McDaniel
1895 - 1952

McDaniel was born on June 10, 1895, in Wichita. Beginning with a career in Vaudeville, she moved to Hollywood in the early 1930s to pursue work in movies and radio. McDaniel's claim to fame was her role as Mammy in "Gone With the Wind." Her work in the movie won her an Oscar for Best Supporting Actress, making her the first black woman to win the award and attend the Oscar ceremonies.

McDaniel

Kay McFarland
1935 -

McFarland, from Topeka, was the first woman in Kansas to serve as a district judge and a state Supreme Court justice.

Gordon Parks
1912 - 2006

Parks was born near Fort Scott, Kan. The youngest of 15 children, he wrote about his youth in his book "The Learning Tree." Parks was the first black director, screenwriter and composer of a significant motion picture. He also was a photographer and writer for Life magazine for 20 years.

Parks

Walter P. Chrysler
1875 - 1940

Chrysler, from Wamego, started the nation's third-largest automobile company, the Chrysler Corporation in 1925. Chrysler began his career in odd jobs, eventually working as a locomotive mechanic.

WORLD NEWS

SINN FEIN MEMBERS VOTE TO BACK NORTH

DUBLIN, Ireland
— Sinn Fein members overwhelmingly voted Sunday to begin cooperating with the Northern Ireland police, formally abandoning their decades-old hostility to legal law and order in the British territory.

The result, confirmed by a sea of raised hands but no formally recorded vote, represented a stunning triumph for Sinn Fein chief Gerry Adams, the former Irish Republican Army commander who has spent 24 years edging his IRA-linked party away from terror and toward compromise.

It strongly improved the chances of reviving a Catholic-Protestant administration, the long-elusive goal of the 1998 Good Friday peace pact, by Britain's deadline of March 26.

FORMER RUSSIAN SPY POISONED BY CUP

LONDON — British police have concluded that a former Russian spy was poisoned by a lethal dose of radioactive Polonium-210 added to his tea at a London hotel, British and American television stations reported Friday.

Investigators have identified the teapot believed to have contained the radioactive tea, which eventually killed Alexander Litvinenko in November, Sky News said, citing unnamed Scotland Yard officials. ABC News had a similar report, citing an unidentified official.

Police officials and a spokesman at the hotel declined to comment on the reports.

The reports also said police have identified another former Russian spy, Andrei Lugovoi, as a suspect in the murder.

Sky News said British prosecutors believe they have enough evidence to charge him.

The reports cap a week of media speculation on the direction of the British investigation into the death.

The Guardian newspaper also reported Friday that police were preparing to submit evidence to prosecutors to decide whether to file charges against Lugovoi, citing unnamed government officials.

Lugovoi, who has strenuously denied playing any role in the murder, was not immediately available for comment.

Litvinenko drank tea with Lugovoi, Russian businessman Dmitry Kovtun and another man at the Millennium Hotel's bar on Nov. 1. Litvinenko, 43, died in a London hospital on Nov. 23.

ABC News said the teapot, found at the hotel, remained in use for several weeks after the poisoning, adding that its radiation readings were extremely high.

11 SCHOOLGIRLS KILLED, 14 INJURED

AHMADABAD, India
— A four-story boarding school collapsed in western India, killing at least 11 girls and injuring 14, an official said Saturday.

The principal said he had told state officials the school urgently needed repairs.

Twenty-five children and six staff were in the building when it came down, local administrator Vatsala Vasudev said after the rescue work ended.

Local authorities ordered an investigation of the collapse.

The school in Tichakpura, a village in the western state of Gujarat, served tribespeople in the area.

"I had brought it to the government's notice that it needed urgent repairs," principal R.D. Choudhry said.

He said the state Department of Tribal Welfare and Education had promised to do the work soon.

K-State overcomes 'ifs' to claim an ugly win

In sports, we love "if/then" statements. Turn on ESPN for five minutes, and you'll hear a dozen of them amid all the yelling. Really, Stephen A. Smith should come with his own mute button.

I digress. Point is, these "if/then" statements make us sound intelligent, like we might actually have a clue what we're talking about. They're scientific, formulaic, tangible ways to predict what will happen in the world of sports.

For instance:

IF Marlies Gipson doesn't get healthy in a hurry, THEN K-State's postseason destination will be spelled W-N-I-T instead of N-C-A-A.

IF Rex Grossman remembers not to throw to the other team, THEN Chicago will win the Super Bowl.

IF Herm Edwards wasn't more conservative than Ronald Reagan, THEN Kansas City might win a playoff game.

You get the idea. Now, let's play a little "if/then" with Saturday's crucial conference tilt between K-State and Nebraska.

IF K-State's three leading scorers combine to shoot 7 of 23 from the floor ...

IF K-State makes just 32 percent of its field goal attempts against the No. 8 shooting team in the country ...

IF the Wildcats make just five field goals in the second half and one in the final 9:45 ...

IF Jermaine Maybank plays more minutes than Cartier Martin

THEN K-State loses. Right?

Except K-State didn't lose, not even close. The Wildcats overcame all those "ifs" to post a convincing 61-45 victory over Nebraska.

The beautiful thing about this bunch is how they can win ugly. This isn't a great shooting team, or even a good shooting team much of the time, but they play hard. And as the Wildcats demonstrated during their five-game winning streak, playing hard makes up for a multitude of shortcomings.

As coach Bob Huggins said, "It's nice to be able to win games that ugly."

Indeed, K-State's winning streak hasn't always been pretty. There was the 24-turnover performance at Missouri, the double-digit deficit against Baylor and Mike Taylor's second-half explosion at Iowa State.

Still, the end result is a thing of beauty: five straight wins, four of them in Big 12 Conference play.

"Guys are playing hard," junior Clint Stewart said. "Hey, that's what you've got to do to win games."

"This is the first time we've won four conference games in a row since ... (cue chirping crickets) ... in awhile."

Since 1990, to be exact. That spans 17 seasons, five head coaches and two conferences. Is this team any more talented than the previous 17? Not significantly. The difference is this: those teams found ways to lose, while this team finds ways to win. And that puts K-State in position to fulfill the biggest "if/then" statement of the bunch.

IF K-State takes care of business in the next 10 games, holds serve at home and steals a road game or two, THEN the Wildcats will be tournament-bound come March.

Even if it takes a few ugly wins to get there.

Fanfare

K-State's Clint Stewart gives high-fives to a sea of purple-clad fans at Bramlage Coliseum Saturday. Stewart led the Wildcats in scoring with 14 points. The victory is the fourth-straight conference win for K-State.

Fans, K-State defense match Huggins' expectations

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This was what coach Bob Huggins expected when he came to K-State.

The fans nearly packed Bramlage Coliseum with purple Saturday, setting a season-high record in attendance with 12,086. The K-State defense also met Huggins' standards, holding Nebraska to a season low in points during the Wildcats' 61-45 win.

"Tonight is how I thought it was going to be," Huggins said. "After (Madness in Manhattan), I thought it would be like that all the time."

So far this year, the atmosphere at Bramlage has left much to be desired. For just the third time, attendance at a men's game reached more than 10,000, even though K-State sold more than 12,000 tickets for every game.

Huggins showed his appreciation by instructing his players to walk over to the student section after the game and thank the fans for coming.

The win over the Huskers (12-7, 1-4 Big 12 Conference) gives K-State (15-6, 4-2 Big 12) its fifth-straight win. In three of those victories, the Wildcats held opponents to less than 40 percent shooting overall.

"That's what he (Huggins) demands," Nebraska coach Doc Sadler said. "Look at the percentage that everybody shoots against his teams."

The Wildcats shut down Nebraska junior Aleks Maric, who entered the game with a team-leading 18 points per game. In the first half, K-State Nebraska's Aleks Maric and K-State's David Hoskins go for a rebound Saturday night in the Wildcats' 61-45 win against the Cornhuskers. The Wildcats are on a four-game winning streak in Big 12 Conference play.

Catrina Rawson

held Maric to zero points on 0-of-4 shooting. He also missed the last five minutes of the first half after getting his second foul of the game.

"It's hard to get in a rhythm when you got to sit out in the first half," Maric said. "But that's no excuse."

Despite scoring six points in the first three minutes of the second period, Maric couldn't make up for his weak first-half performance. He finished with 10 points and nine boards.

K-State's point guards — juniors Clint Stewart and Blake Young and senior Jermaine Maybank — created an effective trio. They combined for 28 points, 7 assists and only two turnovers.

"We were hitting our shots," Young said. "They were trying to double down on Dave (Hoskins) so we were getting wide open jumpers."

Stewart led all scorers with 14 points. Junior David Hoskins and senior Cartier Martin scored 11 and 10, respectively.

K-State's 4-2 Big 12 record is its best start since joining the conference in 1996. The win also gave the Wildcats their first four-game Big 12 winning streak.

Defense key to win over Huskers

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It takes a good team to shoot 32 percent, make just five second-half shots and still escape with a 16-point win against a quality conference opponent.

But NCAA Tournament good? K-State is making its case.

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

K-State's Akeem Wright and Nebraska's Charles Richardson go after a loose ball Saturday evening in the Wildcats' 61-45 win against the Cornhuskers.

After a 61-45 thumping of Nebraska Saturday night at Bramlage Coliseum, the Wildcats are 15-6 overall and 4-2 in the Big 12 Conference.

And they are getting it done with defense.

Nebraska made just 18-of-49 shots against K-State's man-to-man defense, shooting 36 percent from the field while converting 4-of-20 3-point attempts.

The Huskers didn't get much help from 6-foot-11 junior Aleks Maric, who came in averaging 18 points per game. Maric (4-of-12 for 10 points) couldn't get comfortable offensively, as K-State used three different players — freshmen Luis Colon and Jason Bennett and junior David Hoskins — to slow him down.

They wanted to keep him guessing.

"You score in the post by creating space and making angles," coach Bob Huggins said. "We tried not to come at him from the same angle every time."

Throughout the game, the Wildcats clamped down on Maric each time he touched the ball.

"(K-State) switched up a lot," Maric said. "They doubled and pressured every possession. It was tough to get accustomed to their defense."

Maric isn't alone. It seems a lot of teams are having a difficult time with the Wildcats' defense.

During their five-game winning streak, the Wildcats have allowed an average of just 56 points per game. As long as they continue that, they have a chance at winning any game.

"The ability to defend and rebound are two things that ought to be constants for you," Huggins said. "Those are so effort-related and sometimes the ball doesn't go in. It's nice to be able to win games that are that ugly."

Ugly or not, the Wildcats proved over the course of this season they can win these types of games. That's because Huggins' approach is a solid one — he wants his team to focus more on making stops than making shots.

As the Wildcats get ready for a critical four-game stretch, they will need to keep up the defensive intensity and win some grind-it-out games.

If the Wildcats can find a way to do that, they might be playing some meaningful games come late March.

"We've got 10 games to go," Huggins said. "The last 10 games of the year as far as postseason appearances are extremely important ... If you play in a league that's as good as what this league is and you take care of your business, then (making the tournament) generally happens for you."

Staff Reports

BKW | K-State falls despite strong 3-point shooting

Junior Kimberly Dietz knocked down an impressive six 3-pointers to lead the Wildcats with a career-high 25 points, but it wasn't enough to give them the edge over Iowa State Saturday in a 73-68 loss.

Dietz

Senior Claire Coggins hit five threes of her own and finished with 21 points.

It was K-State's (15-5, 3-4 Big 12 Conference) hot shooting from behind the arc that kept it in the running in the first half after Iowa State (16-5, 4-4) went on a 12-2 run to give the Cyclones their biggest lead of the game at 16-9 five minutes into the half.

The Wildcats responded with a run of their own, posting nine points on two 3-pointers from Dietz and another from Coggins to put K-State up 18-16.

K-State led again with less than a minute remaining in the first half, but Iowa State's Heather Ezell hit a three to give the Cyclones the 36-35 advantage at halftime.

The Cyclones were led by freshman Alison Lacey, who scored a career-high 25 points, including 4-of-7 shooting from 3-point range. Junior Toccara Ross finished with 16 points and eight rebounds, and sophomore Nicky Wieben added 11 points and three rebounds for Iowa State.

Iowa State stretched its lead to 44-39 with 17:30 remaining, but K-State continued to answer, cutting away at the Cyclones' lead until a free throw from sophomore Danielle Zanotti gave the Wildcats their final lead of the game, 60-58, with 6:37 remaining.

A three from Lacey gave Iowa State the 63-60 advantage, and though a layup from freshman Ashley Sweat brought the Wildcats within one at the 35-second mark, the Cyclones were able to hold the lead for the win.

Sweat finished with 10 points and five rebounds, and junior Shana Wheeler finished with nine points and nine rebounds.

TEN | K-State tennis makes short work of Drake

A normal tennis match in Ahearn Field House can last as long as five hours. K-State defeated Drake in less than four hours Saturday.

Da Valle

The K-State women's tennis team stuck to its game plan and swept Drake 7-0 for its fifth-straight dual-season opening win.

"I wanted us to come out and play clean across the board," coach Steve Bietau said. "I felt like this was a match that we could or should win, and we've been in that situation before and didn't push ourselves as hard as we are capable of."

The team's quickest win came from junior Fernanda Da Valle, who defeated her opponent Allison Wilkie (6-1, 6-0) in less than 15 minutes.

K-State's speed in the matches and the players' control contributed to the win, Da Valle said.

"We all played really fast," she said. "We didn't struggle very much."

K-State won the doubles point by sweeping all three doubles matches.

In singles play, junior Viviana Yrurita defeated Veronika Leszayova (4-6, 6-2, 6-1) and sophomore Maria Perevoshchikova defeated Zi Wang (6-2, 6-1).

Although Perevoshchikova won in both doubles and singles, she said her game can definitely improve.

"I didn't play that great," she said. "I don't know why. I didn't play in the fall so I think I will get better from here, I hope."

K-State will travel to Wichita State Saturday to take on another Missouri Valley Conference foe.

RUN | Wildcats record 3

Convention Center records

The thin air in New Mexico had some positive effects on the K-State track and field team.

During the Dan DeHart Invitational in Albuquerque, N.M., the Wildcats set three Albuquerque Convention Center records and plenty of personal bests this weekend.

To go along with those records, the track team came home with four event titles.

Senior Kaylene Wagner won her fifth-straight high jump title. She set a personal season-best with a jump of 6-3/4. That jump also set a new Convention Center record.

The other automatic winner was sophomore Scott Sellers. He won the triple jump last week, and this week he won the high jump.

His leap of 7-5 1/4 tied a school record, set a personal best and broke the Convention Center record of 7-3 3/4. Even before this jump he had the nation's best indoor jump of the year with a jump of 7-4 1/4 at the KSU All-Corners meet.

Sophomore Loren Groves was the other one who set a Convention Center record in the women's weight throw with a distance of 67-4. She won the event while junior Laci Heller finished second with a distance of 63-3 1/4.

City manager reflects on 25 years

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With 25 years of city service under his belt and at least one more ahead of him, Manhattan City Manager Ron Fehr is sitting well.

"Ron has been with the city for 25 years, and it's justifiable because of his reputation and dedication to the job," mayor Bruce Snead said. The Manhattan City Commission contracted Fehr for another year at his position last week.

As city manager, Fehr is the city's top non-elected official. He directly oversees nine department directors and is responsible for about 300 employees. He moved through levels of the city's infrastructure on his way to office, but this job is not what he had planned when he started working for the city, he said.

"This wasn't originally a career path," Fehr said. "As I started here I was able to be promoted into other positions, and a good mentor told me that I should consider that profession."

Fehr began his civic career in 1982 as Manhattan's parks and forestry supervisor. After becoming administrative superintendent for parks and recreation in 1984, Fehr went back to school to complete his master's degree.

"Getting my master's opened a new door of opportunity for me," Fehr said.

He took the position of assistant city manager in 1992 to fill the vacancy left when his predecessor, Tom Pearson, became city manager. Fehr earned an eclectic list of job titles, including the acting director of human resources and the acting director of utilities, before ascending to his current job in 2000.

"In terms of his work ethic, I would say Ron has a tremendous amount of energy," Tom Phillips, mayor pro-tem, said. "Ron works long days with meetings and commitments, and he's very cognizant about the importance of meeting and working with the public. He tries to lead by example through his hard work and diligence and attention to detail."

Despite his time commitment to the city, Fehr serves the community in a number of positions. He is a charter member and past president of the Konza Rotary Club, the chairman of the Flint Hills Bread Basket board of directors and an ex-officio member of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce.

"One thing I really enjoy is having the opportunity to be involved in lots of local activities, and I see the fruits and failures of the civic process (firsthand)," Fehr said. "I feel it's important to learn from mistakes, and it's a rewarding experience ability to interact with people on a personal basis."

Fehr said despite his significant career and extensive community involvement, his family is his fondest pastime. His wife, Renee, is an elementary teacher for U.S.D. 323, and the couple has three children, sons Bret and Alec and daughter, Jill.

Fehr said he is confident in Manhattan's growth spirit, knowing that continued dedication from the city will result in the best possibility for Manhattan's citizens.

"We're in the middle of lots of growth and development," he said. "Our major downtown redevelopment project is really staring to take off. It's clearly very challenging, but exciting. This job is an opportunity to be involved positively in the community."

FROM THE ARCHIVES

Veto keeps K-State from being KU

Editor's note: The K-State Collegian published the following piece Feb. 28, 1946. This story addresses the events surrounding the creation of K-State and the University of Kansas. We ask readers to enjoy this piece of history.

Kansas State College narrowly missed becoming Kansas University in 1861 when the resolution making it the state university passed both houses of the state legislature but was vetoed by Governor Charles Robinson. As a result of the veto, it became a land-grant college.

The pioneers of Manhattan founded Bluemont Central College in 1858.

On February 16, 1863, Governor Thomas Carney approved the resolution to accept the offer of Bluemont College as a location for the land-grant college, and thus Manhattan became the seat of Kansas State Agricultural College.

The College opened September 2, 1863. Fifty-two students were enrolled, 26 men and 26 women. About half studied the higher branches, such as Latin, physiology, and mathematics. Spelling, writing and reading were available for those not prepared for higher work.

With almost no money and little equipment, KSAC offered young people an education at minimum expense. Many of the graduates became teachers in commons schools, and many conducted observations and experiments which were valuable to the development of the state.

When new buildings began appearing on the Kansas State campus tomorrow, the oldest building on campus will be torn down. The stone from the "Old Armory" just north of the Veterinary Building will be used in the construction of these new buildings. Because of the fire in the Veterinary Hospital Feb. 19, small animals will be kept in the Armory.

In 1872 one wing of the ambitiously-planned barn was built. In its incomplete state it was used as the barn until 1875 when it was remodeled and became the chief College building for a time.

Since then, it has served many purposes. From 1868 to 1869 it was occupied by Professor Hougham, an agriculturist. In 1875 its interior was remodeled into an "Industrial Hall" to convert it into a building for College classes.

In 1886 the "old barn" received another overhauling and was transformed to provide for much of the museum material and to improve the quarters for the department of botany. It served as the Armory from 1881 to 1911.

in this country while representing their own country, he said. The media, in part, perpetuates the myth of the fanatical cleric and the idea that the entire Muslim world believes one way, he said.

He used an example of Abu Hamza, a cleric in the United Kingdom who, at times, the media quoted exclusively while failing to quote any of the other 100 clerics in the country of England.

"If you could draw a caricature of a Muslim cleric, it would be Abu Hamza," he said.

It is up to the people to stand up and voice their beliefs, al-Faisal said.

"It is not fair to seek sensationalism to sell a newspaper," he said.

During the question-and-answer period following the lecture, President Jon Wefald asked what Saudi Arabia was doing to help the people of Lebanon. Wefald said a group of Saudi students gave him the question.

Saudi Arabia has donated $1.1 billion in aid to Lebanon, and the Islamic bank has donated $250 million for social services and basic infrastructure, al-Faisal said.

He also received questions about how to handle the violence in Iraq, Lebanon and other countries in the Middle East.

He said Saudi Arabia called on the Arab League to help quell the violence and keep it from spreading. The Arab League, a peace organization composed of 22 Middle Eastern countries, is also in Baghdad trying to get the different groups to overcome their differences.

It is ultimately up to the individual states to control the violence in their own countries, al-Faisal said.

"We have to put our own houses in order," he said.

Comedic connection

Performing on the stage in Umberger 105, comedian Steve Hofstetter, entertains an intimate crowd on Saturday night. Tickets for the event were $5 for students and $7 for members of the public. Phi Delta Theta raised over $500 in sales for their philanthropy.

Performer relates to K-State crowd at weekend fund-raising event

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Comedian Steve Hofstetter entertained the crowd Saturday evening as he joked about Internet dating and Ohio State.

The evening was one of Phi Delta Theta fraternity's philanthropic efforts benefiting research for ALS, or Lou Gehrig's disease. Fraternity members sold tickets for the event around town.

"I cannot give an exact figure right now, but we did raise over $500 that we will be donating to the ALS Association," said Mike Kelly, junior in electronic journalism.

The association is Phi Delta's national philanthropy, dedicated to the memory of fraternity brother Lou Gehrig, who was initiated into the fraternity in 1925 at Columbia University.

Hofstetter said the date and the location of the event came together after he contacted Kelly, who worked to bring Hofstetter to K-State during his term as Phi Delta president last year.

Hofstetter, a nationally known comedy writer and stand-up comic, had some extra time and was in the area, so he offered his act at a discounted rate.

While he claims his roots in stand-up comedy, the branches of Hofstetter's career are far-reaching.

"I write a weekly column for Sports Illustrated, and I have a radio show that I am trying to get more and more syndicated," Hofstetter said.

"Everything that I do has its roots in comedy, and that will always be the case."

He said he is always writing for his stand-up routine. He gets the premise for the joke, and once he has written a good one, he said he'll put that joke in and take an older joke out.

"I still have one or two jokes in my routine from my last live album, and when they are all the way out, I will do another live album," Hofstetter said.

He went on to say that no matter what he ends up doing, he will always go out on the road, which he called his first love.

During his routine Saturday,

In response to a joke during the comedy show, members of the audience laugh at comedian Vince Martin's stand-up routine. Martin opened for Hofstetter.

Hofstetter included his advice on Internet dating, which he said is OK as long as people are honest, and said the Ohio State Buckeyes have the wimpiest mascot in the nation.

Hofstetter also included the crowd in his routine, asking many questions and even having conversations with one or two of the patrons.

The crowd seemed very receptive to Hofstetter's brand of comedy and audience members said they connected with him.

"I liked how he was having a conversation with us, and the best part was how he included the crowd in his routine," Lori Wadell, junior in biology, said. "I also liked how he came up with material on the spot, and I would definitely go see him again."

'Catch and Release' has slow start, complete ending

"Catch and Release"

★★★★☆

Movie review by Eileen Laux

"Catch and Release" makes a fine effort at story line and characters but slows a bit with the rhythm of the film.

The story follows Gray Wheeler (Jennifer Garner), who is dealing with the death of her fiancé, Grady. The day of the funeral, she is greeted by friends and family and trying to keep herself together. With his three best friends, Sam (Kevin Smith), Dennis (Sam Jaeger) and Fritz (Timothy Olyphant).

Gray never understood why Grady and Fritz were friends, particularly because of moments like when Fritz has sex with a caterer at Grady's funeral while Gray is trying to pull herself together.

Things begin to unravel as we discover that Grady wasn't as perfect as everyone thought he was when Maureen (Juliette Lewis) shows up with his 3-year-old child.

Gray also begins to realize Fritz is not the lowlife that she thought he was, and they begin to fall for each other.

With Gray's painful determination to get a hold on her life after she must move out and deal with the numerous different obstacles that begin to pop up, the film starts to gain heart, but lacks in keeping a rhythm.

Garner keeps the charm and charisma she has with an audience as she shows Gray rebuilding her life.

Kevin Smith adds a comedic texture that keeps the material light and not so dramatic the audience is bogged down with sadness. Juliette Lewis also provides us with a zany and comedic performance.

The only thing we are left to wonder is do you get over a loss like this so quickly?

Well, in this film, it seems it's a quick thing to get over, even with the infidelity. I don't know that one would get over this so quickly it would barely even affect them later.

Olyphant adds that slimy charm that seems to come up in many of his films, but he gives his character a heart that is capable of love.

Director Susannah Grant, writer of Erin Brockovich, tries her hand at motion pictures and succeeds painting the picture of what it's like for a young woman to have to pick up the pieces and completely rebuild her life.

The film does move somewhat slowly but picks up, and you leave the theater feeling complete and content with how things played out.

It's a good film to go see with friends to laugh and watch the metamorphosis of a character.

THIS WEEK... A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TODAY 1936: U.S. Baseball of Fame elects first members

The U.S. Baseball Hall of Fame elected its first members in Cooperstown, New York: Ty Cobb, Babe Ruth, Honus Wagner, Christy Mathewson and Walter Johnson. The Clark Foundation thought establishing the Baseball Hall of Fame would help to reinvigorate the area's Depression-ravaged economy by attracting tourists.

TUESDAY 1948: Gandhi assassinated

Mohatma Karamchand Gandhi, the political and spiritual leader of the Indian Independence movement, was assassinated in New Delhi by a Hindu fanatic. In 1919, he launched a new satyagraha in protest of Britain's mandatory military draft of Indians. Hundreds of thousands answered his call to protest, and by 1920, he was the leader of the Indian movement for independence.

WEDNESDAY 1968: Viet Cong attack U.S. embassy

A squad of Viet Cong guerrillas attacks the U.S. Embassy in Saigon. The soldiers seized the embassy and held it for six hours until an assault force of U.S. paratroopers landed by helicopter on the building's roof and routed the Viet Cong. The Tet Offensive was planned as a massive, simultaneous attack on the major cities and provincial capitals of South Vietnam.

THURSDAY 2003: Columbia mission ends in disaster

The space shuttle Columbia breaks up while entering the atmosphere over Texas, killing all seven crew members on board. The shuttle launched on Jan. 16, 2003, with a crew of seven.

Eighty seconds into the launch, a piece of foam insulation broke away from the shuttle and hit the left wing.

Columbia re-entered the Earth's atmosphere on Feb. 1. Because the heat-resistant tiles covering the left wing's leading edge had been damaged or were missing, wind and heat entered the wing and blew it apart.

FRIDAY 1887: First Groundhog Day

Groundhog Day, featuring a rodent meteorologist, is celebrated for the first time at Gobbler's Knob in Punxsutawney, Penn. According to tradition, if a groundhog comes out of its hole on this day and sees its shadow, there will be six more weeks of winter weather; no shadow means an early spring.

Groundhog Day has its roots in the ancient Christian tradition of Candlemas Day, when the clergy would bless and distribute candles needed for winter.

Manhattan man victim of suspected homicide

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan man was the victim of a suspected homicide, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department said.

The body of Terrel Morris, 1369 Flint Hills Place, was discovered at approximately 4:30 a.m. Saturday, Quintanar said.

Morris' body was taken for autopsy, and the cause of death was determined to be a gunshot wound, Quintanar said.

Morris' girlfriend, Melissa D. Mitchell, found his body inside the residence.

She called 911, and upon arrival, officers discovered Morris, according to a RCPD press release.

Morris' relation to the area is unknown at this time, Quintanar said.

"We're still doing background on him to find out what his association to the area is," Quintanar said.

If anyone has any information about this alleged crime, they are encouraged to call the RCPD at (785) 537-2112.

The investigation is continuing, Quintanar said.

Delta Chi receives sanctions

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State fraternity will not be able to serve alcohol at functions after violating Interfraternity Council policy.

Delta Chi received sanctions for an unregistered party that took place Dec. 1, 2006, at Delta Chi's house.

At an Interfraternity Council meeting Monday night, the decision was made based on IFC hearings that took place Thursday, Jared Flott, Delta Chi president, said.

The party initially was registered with Social Responsibility Council but was later unregistered based on a decision made by then-Delta Chi president Jay Knopf, Flott said. Despite the unregistration, Delta Chi members decided to have the party, Flott said.

According to IFC's social responsibility policy, all social events except those exclusively involving members of one chapter must be registered on forms provided by IFC, whether alcohol is served or not.

For sanctions received this semester, Delta Chi members must send at least three members to a leadership conference and must spend money on it, Flott said. Delta Chi also is on

Goodnow House Museum honors Kansas Day with costumed tours

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Isaac Goodnow lived in Manhattan, he had a cow that never would stay put.

He wrote in his diaries from 1830 until his death about his cow that always ran off, said Cheryl Collins, director of the Riley County Historical Museum.

So to celebrate Kansas Day, the museum's staff wheeled a plastic cow in front of the place where Goodnow lived with his wife, Ellen.

The Goodnow House Museum, 2309 Claflin Road, gave visitors a free taste of history Monday. Employees of the museum wore clothes from the 1800s and led tours of Goodnow's house for Kansas' 146th birthday.

"Kansas has the best history," Collins said while wearing a green dress from 1870. "Riley County covers a lot of Kansas history."

She said the Goodnows built the house in 1859. Isaac Goodnow was one of the founders of Bluemont College, which changed to the Kansas State College of Agriculture and Applied Science, according to the Kansas Historical Society Web site. Later the name changed to Kansas State University.

Wearing a dress from the 1850s, Liz Harmon, registrar at the Riley County Historical Museum, gave tours of the house throughout the day. The house is packed with items that belonged to the Goodnow family and their niece, Hattie Parkerson, who the Goodnows adopted when her mother died, Harmon said.

Simone Buelow, 9, visited the museum with her grandmother, who works at the museum.

"It was fun, and it was interesting," Buelow said. "I really liked the lemon drops."

Visitors of the museum were given lemon drops because Florence Walker, one of the Goodnows' relatives, enjoyed lemon drops, Collins said.

Buelow's grandmother, Paula Pierce, is transcribing Isaac Goodnow's diaries. Pierce said her grandparents had similar things in their house, so she was able to relate to the history of Goodnow House.

"My grandmother had a pot mill stove and chamber pots," she said. "The whole house reminded me of when I was little at grandma's house."

Pierce and Buelow were two of more than 50 people who visited the museum Monday.

"There has been an interesting variety," she said. "They've come from out of town; there was a family who's daughter came from out of Topeka."

Harmon said one man who came by lived four houses away from the Goodnow House, but had never been inside. His wife encouraged him to take advantage of Kansas Day to see the house.

"He was excited to see it," Harmon said.

The museum is open 9 a.m.-5 p.m. Tuesday through Friday and 2-5 p.m. on weekends.

Microsoft releases new operating system today

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Microsoft released its new operating system, Windows Vista, today at retail stores across the nation, but the system might be incompatible with many K-State students' computers.

Microsoft spent more than five years developing Windows Vista, which boasts new features and design elements that make PCs "easier, safer, and more entertaining," according to the Microsoft Web site.

The new system includes features like customizable sidebars that give users quick access to information of their choosing, and Windows Internet Explorer 7, which allows users to view multiple Web pages at once using tabbed browsing.

Ryan Haulpain, member of Best Buy's Geek Squad, said the aesthetically pleasing new look of Windows Vista and Internet Explorer 7's new tabs feature have attracted significant customer interest.

"We are expecting a large demand for Windows Vista," Haulpain said. "A lot of customers are really excited about it."

Several editions of Windows Vista like Ultimate, Home Premium and Home Basic, are available at Best Buy, Haulpain said. Prices vary from $500-$2,000.

The store offered several user training classes in the past few weeks in anticipation of Vista's release, and delivery and professional installation services are available to customers who buy PCs featuring the new system.

A Home Premium upgrade edition of Windows Vista is available at the K-State Student Union Computer Store at an educationally dis-

Telefund '07 sets high goal

By Katelynn Hasler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The phone lines for the KSU Foundation Telefund are open, and this year's goal is $1.4 million.

K-State's Telefund is the world's largest volunteer telephone campaign for higher education, said Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving for the KSU Foundation.

Since its initiation in 1980, the campaign has raised more than $21 million for the university. This year's target for pledges is more than $1.4 million. Each college within the university has five evenings for callers to raise money.

"While most universities use phones to raise money, ours is unique in its volunteer format," Dowell said. "We continue to rank among the elite programs in the nation in dollars, donors and participants."

In its inaugural year, Telefund raised $130,000. Last year, it raised approximately $1.3 million.

"We have an incredible level of alumni pride," Dowell said. "And in Telefund, that transfers into alumni support. We've got great people all across the country, and those are the people we're calling."

For the past several years, K-State ranked No. 1 in the Big 12 Conference for alumni support with a participation rate of 30 percent.

This year, the "university dropped to second place when the University of Colorado raised its percentage of alumni donors, passing K-State by 1.8 percent. Part of the goal of this year's Telefund is to recover the No. 1 title, Dowell said.

Last year, the average pledge was about $70, and returns on those pledges average about 85 percent.

Each college spends its money differently. The colleges of Arts and Sciences, Business Administration, Education and Veterinary Medicine spend 100 percent of Telefund profits on student scholarships. Other colleges put money into student projects, recruitment and other areas.

Some Telefund volunteers receive $250 scholarships that come from the donations of their family members in a drawing. At the end of the campaign, volunteers will participate in drawings for a Nissan Altima, two motorized scooters and more than $2,000 in scholarships. Telefund ends Feb. 18. The prize drawing will be April 13.

"I think this is going to be a blast," said Kelli Petersen, junior in family life and community services. "I'm also in it for all of the prizes and scholarships."

Telefund also contributes to the Changing Lives campaign. The campaign is a drive for $500 million that will distribute funds into all areas of the university. Eighty people have made gifts of $1 million or more for this campaign.

Volunteers make calls from 80 phones, plus six cell phones provided by Alltel, from 6 to 10 p.m. Sunday through Thursday.

Volunteers read from a script that remains unchanged since Telefund's first year. The foundation's goal is to have 1,600 student volunteers participate by the end of the campaign, Dowell said.

"This is a great thing for students to participate in," said Virginia Moxley, dean of Human Ecology. "As they enter the world of work, they're going to have to be making cold calls like this to clients."

"There's also a lot of team building. They bond with the students across the table, and there are some delightful alumni on the other end of the line."

Dean of business gives time to Saudi, Afghan universities

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Few professors at K-State can claim a storied history like Yar. M. Ebadi's.

Ebadi, dean of the College of Business, has gone through more than most in his quest for higher education.

Changing countries, cultures and ways of life, Ebadi moved back and forth between the United States and Afghanistan several times, escaped under the cover of night and came full circle to help restore the university where his collegiate pursuit began.

For the better part of last year, Ebadi worked with a Saudi Arabian university to gain worldwide accreditation for its business school.

Also on the table for Ebadi is the rebuilding of Kabul University, which was torn apart during the wars that plagued his home country for the past two-and-a-half decades.

Ebadi acts as a mentor for Prince Sultan University in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, helping the university gain worldwide accreditation through the Association to Advance Collegiate Schools of Business.

"In short, as their mentor, I assist PSU in determining that their academic structure will meet the accreditation standards of the AACSB," Ebadi said.

Ebadi said it is not as easy as just going to the university and pointing out what needs to be done because the money for the upgrades comes from the school, not the AACSB.

After making his first return trip to Afghanistan several years ago, Ebadi said he was moved by the destruction he saw from the continuous wars for oil, territory and religion.

Upon his return to K-State, Ebadi spoke with his fellow deans about helping out in Afghanistan. After conducting some research, the group found the World Bank grant, a grant which helps rebuild the universities in Afghanistan.

The grant awarded K-State $8 million to rebuild the Colleges of Engineering and the English department of the College of Arts and Sciences, allowing Kabul University to reopen.

Several faculty members also are working to rebuild the university.

A native of Afghanistan, Ebadi's first school was the University of Kabul. After his sophomore year, he transferred to the Georgia Institute of Technology to get his first degree in mechanical engineering.

Following his graduation from Georgia Tech, Ebadi returned to Afghanistan, where he taught with the faculty of Kabul University.

After two-and-a-half years at Kabul, Ebadi returned to the United States and received his master's and doctoral degrees from Indiana University.

When Ebadi returned to Afghanistan after graduating from Indiana, he aided in the development of a program in engineering and management at Kabul University.

Soon after his return to the country, a coup d'etat supported by the Soviet Union overthrew the government, forcing Ebadi to re-evaluate his standing with the new government.

"I was certainly a target because of my western education," he said. "They searched my office and home several times and they could never find any reason that I would support their enemies."

After becoming more and more uneasy with the political climate, Ebadi made a daring midnight escape and came to the United States.

He returned to Indiana and worked as a visiting assistant professor in the College of Business. While filling the position, Ebadi said he began to look for permanent work.

"I was thinking of my kids, and I wanted a place where they could get a quality education and I found that in Manhattan," Ebadi said.

Ebadi said he looked for an environment similar to Bloomington, Ind., where he attended school.

Since moving to Manhattan, Ebadi has filled many positions at the university and in various organizations.

He began as an associate professor in the Department of Management, a position he held for more than four years.

He became the head of the department in March 1987, and continued his ascension through the ranks until he became dean of the College of Business Administration in March of 1996.

Ebadi also worked with schools closer to home to gain accreditation from the AACSB.

In 2002 he was a member of a team that helped the University of Missouri at Kansas City receive accreditation.

Board to nominate historic Manhattan neighborhoods

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Historic Resources Board members debated which houses and districts in Manhattan to nominate for the National Register of Historic Places Monday evening.

Places on the register can qualify for tax benefits, qualifications for federal funding for historic preservation and national recognition of the places national, state or local significance.

The area east of City Park includes a number of historic properties, but the community already is involved with organizing and protecting their neighborhood, said board member Bonnie Lynn-Sherow.

"I'm really excited about the city park area, they're already self-motivated," Lynn-Sherow said. The board should focus on rare houses that are most in danger from redevelopment, she said.

Member Ray Weisenburger said he favored focusing on the area southeast of City Park because there are many historic houses and it has not been well-preserved.

"This is kind of a leftover area that nobody seems to care about," Weisenburger said.

The board asked for more detailed maps that include the type of houses, what kind of siding they have and how old they are before it makes a decision. It also discussed some of the issues connected with nominating places for the register, like getting the residents interested and the downtown redevelopment projects.

One of the problems that came up was the demand for more student housing off-campus, which is causing some historic buildings to be altered to house more people or be demolished to make room for higher-density housing.

The board will decide which districts to nominate in a special meeting on Feb. 19th.

Also coming up is a "Historic Summit" on February 8, a meeting focusing on preservation and upkeep of Manhattan and other issues, Lynn-Sherow said.

TO THE POINT

Volunteering for Telefund is time well spent

Calling strangers for an evening activity might not be the epitome of a fun time. But to K-State departments, it's a way to survive.

According to the KSU Foundation Web site, Telefund is the world's largest all-volunteer telephone campaign for higher education. For the past several years, this mode of raising funds has brought millions of dollars to K-State departments.

The distribution of funds depends on the college, but money might be given to educational materials, faculty development, student projects and, most importantly, student scholarships.

In the colleges of Arts and Sciences, Business Administration, Education and Veterinary Medicine, 100 percent of the money donated during Telefund directly goes to student scholarships.

It can be difficult to motivate yourself to perform any task for free, especially if it involves calling random people. But, get this — you might get something in return.

Along with the warm fuzzies you collect by assisting your college, student volunteers are eligible for prizes and free giveaways when they work a four-hour shift at Telefund. We're talking free soda, snacks and the possibility of piping-hot pizza or a gift certificate to a local establishment.

Not enticing enough? Your name gets placed in a drawing for a new car.

It's hard to give up time to volunteer to call alumni for an entire evening. But prick your finger, see if you bleed purple and sign up for a shift.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

For the last year or so, teenagers and hipsters across the United States have been calling cool things "book." Some picked it up from their friends, while others coined it themselves.

The uptake of this new term was driven by cell phones, just as other terms were introduced through forms of technology.

Coining new meanings of words isn't easy and historically, few have been successful. Shakespeare introduced dozens upon dozens of popular phrases in his plays, while Lewis Carroll is known for his words.

Take, for example, the word "chortle." Coined by Carroll in "Through the Looking Glass," it mixes a chuckle and a snort to fill a gap in the English language.

Once instant messaging came along, abbreviations like "lol" and "brb" followed, signifying "laugh out loud" and "be right back," respectively. For a medium where speed is essential, using the fewest letters possible became a significant advantage.

Then came cell phones, which usually have nine keys. One solution for text messages was to have someone repeatedly push a number to choose later letters on that key.

For example, "C" is the third letter on the "2" key, so we'd have to type the "2" button three times to get "C" to show up. In practice, this makes text messaging painful.

So, as a solution, a company called Tegic Communications introduced what's known as "T9" technology.

Using this method, you just type each letter key once, and the cell phone consults a dictionary to find out the possible words that you could have meant, choosing the most common one to display on the screen.

For example, "cool" would be entered as 2-6-6-5. However, on most phones, "cool" isn't what comes up first on the screen. Instead, the phone suggests "book," a more common word using the same number entry.

This is corrected by pushing the down arrow to select a different possible word for that number entry, but in the heat of texting, such mistakes can be missed.

So, a few errant text messages later, "book" started to be associated with "cool."

Smoking bans detrimental to state health care, education programs

As adults, being denied the use of a legal substance is an utter disgrace to our fundamental privileges.

Ayn Rand, the Russian-born philosopher, staunchly opposed violations to freedom based on a "public good" determined by a select few in government, saying "Individual rights are not subject to a public vote; a majority has no right to vote away the rights of a minority; the political function of rights is precisely to protect minorities from oppression by majorities and the smallest minority on earth is the individual."

Kansas senator David Wyson, R-Mission Hills, produced Senate Bill 37 to ban smoking throughout the state in all public places. This ban would extend to all restaurants, bars and recreational facilities.

When questioned about Senate Bill 37, Wyson had the audacity to state, "Eighty-two percent of Kansans don't smoke. This bill was written for the majority."

People already know and understand the effects of smoke to their health. If anyone believes smoking is healthy, I have some beachfront property in Kansas to sell.

The battle over smoking has been fought in the trenches at the local level. In recent years organizations such as Students for Clear Air Manhattan, with their fitting acronym SCAM, failed to push through legislation banning smoking in public places within Manhattan city limits.

Some people, especially those in SCAM, don't see a problem with banning all tobacco. The truth is, deep inside the dark space between their ears, they know state governments would struggle to fund programs without smokers.

The proposed legislation to ban smoking and the increase in tobacco taxes passed last year will have costly effects on the state budget and economy.

According to the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, bans on smoking and tobacco tax do work to encourage fewer people to smoke. The problem lies when revenue from tickets and taxes are earmarked for programs such as healthcare and education.

A 25 percent increase to the cost of tobacco leads to an 11 percent decline in revenue for state programs.

In English, when prices go up, tobacco users buy less, leaving schools and health programs underfunded.

Under Senate Bill 37, smoking in a public place results in a $200 fine for the first offense, equivalent to traveling 94 miles per hour in a 70 mph zone or buying alcohol for minors.

The fines are placed into the state's general fund, giving the government of Kansas more money to spend on wasteful pork projects.

There is a demand for smoke-free restaurants and bars, but the choice should be made by those who own the respective establishments.

Bars in Aggieville would be more prosperous if the amount of non-smoking bars met the equilibrium demand for smoke-free establishments.

Rusty's Next Door is the only smoke-free bar in Aggieville. Pete Anderson, owner and manager of Rusty's Last Chance said, "Across the line, when comparing margins there is not much of a drop off, but we are very unique. If everyone was to go nonsmoking, profits would go down."

Profits increase for owners who cater to their clientele. Successful businesses will change and adapt to produce higher profits. When profits increase in businesses, the state receives more money in tax revenue to help fund its projects.

We do not elect government officials to interfere with private business or regulate our health. We elect them to help create the opportunity for prosperity of all individuals.

For a state ranked dead last in private sector job growth, according to the Kansas Taxpayers Network, it would seem our government officials have a lot better things on which to focus.

SUICIDE BOMBER KILLS 3 IN ISRAELI TOWN

EILAT, Israel — A Palestinian suicide bomber killed three Israelis at a bakery Monday in the first such attack inside the country in nine months. The two radical groups that claimed to have sent him said they were trying to end weeks of Palestinian infighting by taking aim at Israel instead.

The bombing was praised by the Palestinians' governing Hamas movement as legitimate resistance — a position sure to hurt efforts to end a crippling economic boycott imposed by the international community.

The attack also jeopardized a two-month truce in the Gaza Strip. Israeli security chiefs met Monday to discuss a response.

"This is a grave incident, it's an escalation and we shall treat it as such," said Defense Minister Amir Peretz.

It was the first suicide bombing in this Red Sea resort of 50,000 at Israel's southern tip near the Jordanian and Egyptian borders. The town is a popular getaway for Israelis because it has been insulated from Israeli-Palestinian violence by its distance from the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

A relative identified the third victim as Yisrael Zalmal-loa, who emigrated to Israel from Peru. The relative, who would give only her first name, Norma, said his parents live in Miami but had no other details. U.S. Embassy officials in Tel Aviv had no information.

"It was awful — there was smoke, pieces of flesh all over the place," said Benny Mazgini, a 45-year-old witness.

Eilat resident Yossi Voltinski said he picked up the attacker, who was hitchhiking on the edge of town, shortly before the attack. But he grew suspicious because the man was dressed in heavy clothing on a warm day.

"He was wearing a coat closed tightly and was wearing a hat. He didn't speak Hebrew. He was very irritable," Voltinski said. "I then understood that without a doubt this was a hostile person."

He said he dropped the man off on a side road with few people and alerted authorities. "From when I called the police until the explosion, no more than a few minutes elapsed," he told Channel 10 TV.

SCIENTISTS FINISH CLIMATE REPORT

PARIS — The planet's temperature is rising, sea levels threaten to swallow coastlines and the world's residents want to know how much to fear. An authoritative answer comes this week.

Some 500 scientists and officials convened in Paris on Monday for a week of word-by-word editing of a long-awaited report on how fast the world is warming, how serious it is — and how much is the fault of humans.

The report by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, to be released Friday, could influence what governments and businesses do to fight global warming. It will be watched closely in the U.S., whose government stands accused by many around the world of playing down the peril.

Scientists are keeping quiet about the report's contents, but say it is both more specific and more sweeping than previous efforts to chart hotter summers, snowless ski seasons and break-away ice sheets and what they mean for the Earth's future.

The report is expected to warn of continued temperature rises through the century and reiterate that people-created pollution is partly to blame.

HUGO CHAVEZ SEEKS TO REMAKE SOCIETY

CARACAS, Venezuela — Hugo Chavez has about everything a president could want: popular support, a marginalized opposition, congress firmly on his side and a booming economy as his six-year term begins.

Now, he's about to become even more powerful — the all-Chavista National Assembly is poised to approve a "mother law" as early as Wednesday enabling him to remake society by presidential decree. In its latest draft, the law would allow Chavez to dictate measures for 18 months in 11 broad areas, from the "economic and social sphere" to the "transformation of state institutions."

Chavez calls it a new era of "maximum revolution," setting the tone for months of upheaval as he plans to nationalize companies, impose new taxes on the rich and reorient schools to teach socialist values. With near-religious fervor and plenty of oil wealth, Chavez is mobilizing millions of Venezuelans, intent on creating a more egalitarian society.

Already, profound changes can be seen throughout Venezuela.

Those who felt left out of the old system are thrilled at the prospect of having a voice in politics. Others are horrified, predicting that doors will close on their personal freedoms under one-man rule, although exactly what Chavez will do with his power remains unclear.

Purple Power Hour host, puts in late nights for show

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Picture a late Thursday night on the K-State campus. The large, limestone halls seem hollow and dim, but inside of Dole Hall the action is starting to heat up.

Six computers in Dole 162 are lit with action, full of video highlights, voice tracks, rough drafts and scripts. The desks are covered with game notes, coffee, cameras and tape reels.

It's 2 a.m., but the time is lost on a group of men diligently working. This is "Purple Power Hour."

Shane Howard is the host and producer of "Purple Power Hour," the student-run sports TV program at K-State. Howard is a junior in electronic journalism and has worked at the show since his freshman year. He also works for KSNT-TV in Topeka as a sports reporter and anchor and has several feature video segments on www.gopowercat.com.

Q. Tell me about the late nights at Dole Hall?

A. Whenever we have a show coming up, we're up here throughout the week. The night before the show, it gets really hectic. We usually get out of here at 3 a.m. I'd say 2 a.m. would be considered a good night. Sometimes we are up here all night.

The reason we're up here so long is because there's tons of stuff to take care of doing a live to tape show. First, the script has to be written, and it has to be perfect. Then, you need to have the tapes edited to a "T," and it all has to be ready to go for live television.

Howard

Q. What is the toughest thing about being live on the air?

A. For me, it's probably just making sure that everything is going smoothly without getting too caught up. If something goes wrong, you just have to move on and go with it.

Q. What professional sports TV programs do you enjoy?

A. I like the way "ESPNNews" runs with the mix of the guys. It's more of a news show. Honestly, I try to model myself after Johnny Cage, sports director at KSNT. He has a good delivery, and he has a very strong, active voice when he talks.

Q. What is your favorite sport to watch live?

A. Probably football, but a good, loud basketball game is hard to beat.

Q. With all of the time constraints, why do you still produce "Purple Power Hour?"

A. Because, as stressful as it is and as much work as it is, it's still a lot of fun. Everybody we work with makes it worthwhile. We all have a good time.

It's hard to complain about much because you're getting to cover K-State sports on a weekly basis. You're getting to talk to athletes, and that's not really work to me.

Q. What are your plans for broadcasting in the future?

A. Really, I'm not sure. I'm not sure if I want to do sports my whole life. I definitely don't want to do news. I guess like anything it's a tough business to be involved in. You've got to love it, and I'm pretty sure I love it. But to be honest with you, I'm not sure.

Q. What is the best part about doing the show?

A. The best part is having the opportunity to push myself with live television and challenge myself with writing and being creative. I think it's helped me to be more creative writing papers and in school. It just helps me to be much more of a creative thinker.

Link between spirituality, sports becomes complicated at public institutions

Sports and spirituality criss and cross like the X's and O's in a football playbook. They intersect and diverge, attract and repel. Sometimes they run side-by-side, and sometimes they collide. Spiritual imagery shows up everywhere in the sports world, from a wide receiver's end zone celebration to a basketball player's tattooed bicep. However, the intersection of sports and spirituality can create controversy, especially at public universities like K-State.

FAITH ON THE FIELD

Jordan Henricks walks into the Vanner Football Complex with no helmet to hide his scruffy blond beard.

"Watch this guy, he's Amish," some-one jokes.

Henricks is not Amish. He is a Christian, and he serves as president of K-State's Fellowship of Christian Athletes chapter.

For Henricks, a redshirt freshman defensive back, faith and football are inextricably tied.

"With being a man of God, a man who believes what Jesus did for me on the cross, it follows you everywhere," Henricks said. "Anything simple from just praying before you eat breakfast to being involved in athletics, it's a necessity."

"I don't know that you really can separate it."

However, Henricks admits the pressures of collegiate athletics can present a challenge, and faith isn't always popular in the locker room.

"Younger guys come in and don't know what to expect. At first, it's a little tougher. But once you basically let everyone know what you stand for, people develop a kind of respect for you," Henricks said.

Henricks said he drew encouragement from former strength coach Rod Cole, adviser for K-State's FCA group.

During the season, Henricks also attended a team chapel service before every game.

However, he said former coach Bill Snyder and current coach Ron Prince seldom addressed matters of spirituality with the team.

"It's a sensitive subject for some people," Henricks said. "When you're dealing with a team where you want everyone to play hard for you and buy into what you're telling them, you don't want to be outspoken about a belief that might turn people away."

GUIDANCE FOR ALL FAITHS

Father Keith Weber didn't set out to become a sports chaplain. However, an unexpected phone call changed that.

"Coach Prince called me one day and asked if I would come over and visit with him. I did not seek it out," Weber said with a laugh.

Weber, a chaplain at St. Isidore's Catholic Student Center, said he didn't know the nature of his visit until he arrived at the football complex. There, K-State's football coach asked Weber to serve as a spiritual adviser for the team.

Weber's duties included leading a pregame chapel service and providing spiritual guidance for players of all faiths.

"When coach Prince asked me to come over to his office, one thing he did ask was if I would be comfortable talking to a person of another religion besides Christian. Would I feel comfortable still supporting their faith, but still helping them deal with their problem as a person of faith? I said I would," Weber said.

"I think that's an important part of being a chaplain of a sports team."

Weber, who joins the team on the sideline during home games, never observed coaches openly discussing matters of spirituality with the team. However, he said there are other ways to communicate faith.

"I think we share our faith in many ways," Weber said. "To me, one of the best ways to express faith in a coaching position is not to talk about Christ, as much as show Christ in your actions. I think that's the best way to show your faith."

"Just by being a good, caring, peaceful, loving person, you can express your faith."

'IT'S NOT NOTRE DAME'

In 2003, the Manhattan Mercury published a story with the headline "K-State's women basketball players know it's important to have faith in God."

The story featured interviews with several Christian players, as well coach Deb Patterson.

Beneath a large photo of coaches and players clasping hands in prayer, the story quoted Patterson saying, "It was my hope that we could build a program where we could talk about faith, talk about the Lord."

That article caught the attention of a group known as Americans United for Separation of Church and State.

Jeremy Leaming is a spokesman for Junior Blake Young sports a cross, a common symbol of the Christian faith.

Washington-based Americans United. He took special interest in this case, because he was born in Manhattan, and his father taught at K-State.

"The important thing to note is that Kansas State is not a private university," Leaming said. "It's not Notre Dame. This is a public university. Quite frankly, the university has a duty to ensure (Patterson) is not violating the First Amendment."

Americans United sent a letter to K-State in 2003 expressing concerns about the women's basketball program and spiritual adviser Sterling Hudgins.

At state universities, spiritual advisers must be volunteers and cannot be classified as university employees.

In a letter obtained by the Collegian, K-State attorney Richard Seaton responded to Americans United's concerns about Hudgins.

Staff Reports

FBC | K-State football adds Leonard, promotes Rahne

K-State football coach Ron Prince announced the addition of Frank Leonard as assistant coach and the promotion of Ricky Rahne from graduate assistant to assistant coach Monday.

Leonard most recently served as a special assignment scout in the New England Patriots organization and will take over as K-State's tight ends coach in place of James Jones, whose contract was not renewed, Prince said.

Rahne, K-State's offensive graduate assistant during the 2006 season, was promoted to running backs coach, according to Prince. He served the 2005 season as the running backs coach at Cornell prior to joining Prince's staff last spring.

"I am very pleased to announce the hiring of Frank Leonard and the promotion of Ricky Rahne," Prince said. "Both men are tenacious, go-getters and I believe provide our football organization with an exciting blend of experience and youth. But above all, these coaches are excellent teachers and men of integrity and I expect both of them to be real assets to our program."

As a special assignment scout with the Patriots from 2004-06, Leonard worked closely with the organization's personnel evaluation of both college and professional players and contributed to many of the team's player personnel decisions.

At Richmond, Leonard mentored a number of players who earned All-America honors, including offensive linemen Eric King (1998), who went on to play for the Kansas City Chiefs, and Eric Beatty (2000).

A record-setting quarterback while at Cornell University, Rahne worked closely with all aspects of the K-State offense during 2006 as a graduate assistant.

Prior to joining Prince's staff at K-State, Rahne spent the 2005 season as the running backs coach at Cornell, where he mentored first team All-Ivy League selection Luke Siwula. During 2005, Siwula had six 100-yard rushing games. He ended the year with 1,086 yards on the ground for the 10th-best single-season rushing total in Cornell history.

RAC | Kentucky Derby winner put down after 8-month struggle

Barbaro was euthanized Monday after suffering complications from his gruesome breakdown at last year's Preakness, ending an eight-month ordeal that made him even more of a hero than he was as a champion on the track.

"Certainly, grief is the price we all pay for love," co-owner Gretchen Jackson said.

A series of ailments — including laminitis in the left rear hoof, an abscess in the right rear hoof, as well as new laminitis in both front feet — proved too much for the gallant colt. Barbaro was given a heavy dose of a tranquilizer and an overdose of an anesthetic and put down at 10:30 a.m.

"I really didn't think it was appropriate to continue treatment because the probability of getting better was so poor," said Dr. Dean Richardson, chief of surgery at the New Bolton Center.

Richardson, fighting back tears, added: "Barbaro had many, many good days."

The bay colt underwent nearly two dozen surgeries and other procedures, including cast changes under anesthesia. He spent time in a sling to ease pressure on his legs, had pins inserted and was fitted at the end with an external brace — extraordinary measures given that most horses never survive those injuries.

Weeks of positive reports turned into months. Barbaro was eyeing the mares, nickered, gobbling up his feed and trying to walk out of his stall. But Richardson warned there still could be trouble, and by mid-July, his greatest fear became reality — laminitis struck Barbaro's left hind leg.

On Sunday, a day after Barbaro's fight for survival had reached a critical point, Richardson compared the various injuries to a "house of cards." One part falls, and the rest start to crumble.

In this case, it was the laminitis that attacked both front feet that left him vulnerable.

Win or lose, God not responsible for sports outcomes

Take a look at my mug shot. You see that half-grin? That's the closest I've been to a smile in 13 years.

Yep, it's not easy to get me to smile anymore. Not with my sports teams tanking out of the playoffs early; not with my favorite players flailing for free agency and signing with a division rival; not with closers blowing saves, kickers shanking field goals and coaches misusing precious timeouts.

You know what's sad? I used to point all my anger, blame and resentment in the wrong direction. I blamed it all on God.

"God hates my sports teams," I would say.

But not even God can take credit for some of my teams' collapses. Do the names Lin Elliot and Steve Bartman ring a bell? If God pulled the strings on those messes, that's just cruel.

Some people suggest God cares about the outcome of games, that he has a rooting interest. Really? They got bookies in heaven?

Ever watch a football game that comes down to a last-second field goal?

Picture, if you will, two sidelines. Players from both teams are kneeling on the ground, holding hands and praying the field goal goes their way. You've seen this before.

Now put yourself in the post-game press conferences for both teams. The winning team probably said something along the lines of, "God was looking down on us today."

The losing team will talk X's and O's: "We just didn't bring it. We didn't execute when we needed to. We didn't make enough plays."

God gets all the credit, but never the blame.

Still, does God really care whether the field goal went wide or short, if the snap was high or the hold was bad?

Today's athletes apparently think so, and I've got a problem with that.

I believe religion plays a strong role in sports — I really do. It gives athletes an extra outlet and a sense of security, knowing the Lord is looking over them.

But save the praying and the references to God for what's really important: leaving the playing field injury-free with your limbs and body parts attached.

It's OK for athletes to take credit for a win and humbly accept the accolades and attention that often come with victory. It's why athletes spend so much time putting hard work and energy into preparation.

It's no different in the classroom.

When students ace a test, they don't deflect all of the praise to the professor. Sure, the professor steered them in the right direction, maybe even helped put them in a position to succeed. Yet the professor didn't fill in the correct answers on the Scantron sheet.

And God didn't study a 150-page playbook or sit in on three days of film sessions.

Come to think of it, I doubt God is even much of a sports fan anyway.

RELIGION | Critics say K-State's coaches, spiritual advisers violate athletes' First Amendment rights

"Mr. Sterling Hudgins is not a paid employee of the University," Seaton said in the letter. "He is a volunteer who serves as team adviser. Although Mr. Hudgins has been referred to as team chaplain, his role has been and is that of a team adviser."

K-State athletic director Tim Weiser confirmed Hudgins and other spiritual advisers are not employees of the university or the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

"Kansas State does not employ team chaplains," Weiser said in an e-mail response. "Certain teams have team advisers, some of whom address spiritual issues as needed, who are volunteers."

Though K-State's spiritual advisers do not receive a salary, Leaming said the possibility of Constitutional violations still exists.

"Is this adviser on the sidelines with the coach? Does the coach advise the basketball team to visit this counselor? The coach may describe it as a voluntary position, but it really depends on how the position is used," Leaming said.

Weiser said he felt AU's concerns were sufficiently addressed in 2003.

However, an Oct. 1, 2006, article in The Kansas City Star quoted former K-State players who said they were required to attend Hudgins' chapel services before home games, as well as services conducted by Patterson on the road.

Hudgins, who also serves as a spiritual adviser with the football team, chose not to comment on matters concerning the basketball program.

But Jessica McFarland, who played at K-State from 2002-2006, confirmed that players were required to attend chapel during her first three years with the team.

"We felt like we had to be there, because it was during pregame meal, and you had to be at pregame meal," McFarland said.

The services remained mandatory, McFarland said, until 2005. At that point, Patterson moved the service to a different time and stressed that attendance was optional.

McFarland said she stopped attending Hudgins' chapel services during her senior season.

"I just felt like it was my own decision to make," McFarland said. "Sometimes I was too busy to go anyway."

PART OF THE TEAM

When Shanda Murdoch decided to play basketball at K-State, she knew religion was part of the equation.

Patterson made her Christian faith clear during the recruiting process, Murdoch said.

"She never pushed her beliefs on me during the recruiting process. She did make it known that religion was very much a part of her team and her coaching," Murdoch said.

That didn't bother Murdoch at first — she was a Christian as well. So the 6-foot-2 forward from Oklahoma City committed to K-State and joined the team in 2003.

Murdoch said she had no problems attending chapel and considered Hudgins a positive influence, however, she wasn't always comfortable with the way Patterson incorporated religion into her coaching.

"Coach Patterson was very quick to either quote scripture or use religion in meetings with her program. I was fine with her demonstrating her beliefs, but there were times I felt uncomfortable with her actions," Murdoch said.

"There were definitely times Coach P used her authority as a coach to either press her personal beliefs on me or even degrade me. I did not appreciate being judged by my coach."

Murdoch transferred after just one season and now attends Oklahoma State.

She said religious issues were a "huge factor" in her decision to leave K-State.

"I didn't feel like what Coach P was doing was a good influence on me spiritually," Murdoch said.

"As a woman in her position, she had a chance to have a huge positive impact on everyone in her program, as a Christian as well as a leader. I felt like she abused her roles as both."

BELIEFS AT WORK

Ron Brown spent 17 years as an assistant football coach at Nebraska — 11 under Tom Osborne and six under Frank Solich.

Brown and Osborne shared a strong Christian faith. Brown said those beliefs were communicated to — but not forced upon — Nebraska players.

"We had a chapel service that we did before every game that was optional. Any player who wanted to pray at the middle of the field after the game was free to do it. None were forced to," Brown said.

Brown found himself at the center of a controversy in 1999 when he addressed the topic of homosexuality on his Christian radio show.

"I rebuked my fellow Christians for the way we've treated homosexual people in this country," Brown said. "We felt like we were disdaining them."

Those comments weren't controversial. Brown's next statement was.

"In the same show, I declared that homosexuality is a sin according to the Bible. You've still got to call a ball a ball," Brown said.

"A newspaper picked that up, and it got to be national news ... It got to be this big debate."

Brown said those comments came back to haunt him when he applied for a head coaching position at Stanford. The university didn't invite him for a second interview, he said, because university officials felt his beliefs were too conservative for Stanford's diverse community.

Stanford denied those allegations, although the Daily Nebraskan quoted a Stanford official who said Brown's religion played a role in the decision.

After all that, Brown has no regrets.

"When you talk about Christ in the public square, it's going to hit the fan," said Brown, who now works full-time with FCA. "I was glad we dumped paint on the ghost."

"It was a message for Christians around the country not to water down their résumés. If you don't get the job, God has something else in mind for you."

Weiser's statement to the Collegian summed up the fine line coaches and universities must walk when it comes to sports and religion.

"Kansas State University and the Athletic Department comply with all applicable federal and state laws and regulations, as well as NCAA guidelines with regard to the Establishment Clause and non-discrimination," Weiser said. "Such laws provide that Kansas State University, as a public institution, cannot endorse religion; however, the same laws also protect the free exercise of religion by individuals, including public employees."

Thus, the fine line is drawn. The Constitution protects a coach's right to exercise a specific belief, but also prohibits coaches from endorsing their beliefs in an official capacity.

For Leaming, that means coaches like Patterson must keep their spiritual beliefs out of the gym and the locker room.

"Patterson is a state actor, and while she is working in her official capacity as a coach, she must ensure that First Amendment principles are being adhered to," Leaming said.

But for Brown, it's not that simple. Brown said exercising Christianity means more than going to church on Sunday and shelving his beliefs for the rest of week.

"Secularizing things, I think that's very misguided," Brown said. "I do not believe that I can do life differently in the classroom, on the field or in a church. To me, it all has to be the same."

"That's what integrity means. It means you're the same person wherever you're at."

MICROSOFT | System requires sufficient memory

counted price of $79.95, but students should be aware the system is incompatible with campus anti-virus software, manager Chris Loehr said.

"Campus policy requires that you use the campus anti-virus in order to connect to the K-State network," Loehr said. "But the anti-virus does not work with Vista."

Students, faculty and staff members interested in Vista for home or professional use might want to consider licensing the software, Loehr said.

Beginning in April or May, the Union Computer Store will offer the opportunity to license the Vista Business Edition. Licensing a product, Loehr said, means a customer buys a complete edition of the software without all of its packaging frills.

"Basically, the company just ships you the CD," he said. "There's no fancy box, but you get a discount."

Students should ensure their PCs have sufficient memory capacity and hardware before rushing out to buy Windows Vista, said Seth Galitzer, systems administrator for the Department of Computing and Information Sciences.

A significant amount of RAM (random access memory) — at least one or two gigabytes — and a video card are required to run the system and utilize the new graphics included in the user interface, Galitzer said, which means older computers might not be able to run Windows Vista.

Galitzer recommended students visit the Microsoft Web page and download the Windows Vista Upgrade Advisor to determine whether their PC can run the new system, and which of the system's features would be available.

Bugs or glitches in new computer software are common, Galitzer said, which is why he cautions students to wait a few months before buying new programs.

"Vista was just released to the major market around Christmas," Galitzer said. "There are all kinds of ways a computer can run and its applications can interact."

A few big patches may be coming out in the next couple of months. Waiting may be a good idea."

SANCTIONS | Fraternity to be on warning status

alcoholic social probation and cannot have social functions involving alcohol. Members also must work with IFC to create an action plan to ensure the situation does not happen again, Flott said.

During fall and spring 2008, Delta Chi will be on warning status and must pay $550. The fraternity can have two alcoholic social events next semester and if they go OK, the fraternity may have more, Flott said.

"We're working to improve ourselves so this doesn't happen again," Flott said. "We're taking the steps to improve ourselves."

Zach Hauser, IFC president and former Delta Chi member, reported the unregistered party to IFC, Flott said.

Flott said Delta Chi has not received any other sanctions in recent years.

At press time, the overall percentage of violations reported to IFC were not known.

When IFC initially receives a concern about a policy violation, IFC's director of judicial affairs investigates the alleged situation, Scott Jones, director of greek affairs, said.

The IFC director's group then determines if there is sufficient information to have a hearing.

The hearing consists of a formal review of allegations, and witness are brought in if necessary, Jones said.

It is the responsibility of the hearing panel to determine whether violations have occurred, Jones said.

SEX ED

Sexual health advice from the experts at SHAPE'Battle' provides awareness

By Sandra McLeod

SEXUAL HEALTH AWARENESS PEER EDUCATORS

Sexpert: one who possesses knowledge regarding sex, sexual health and responsible decision-making.

This might sound a little far-fetched, but it's kind of a big deal. People know about this.

Each year Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators and Lafene Health Center are host to the Battle of the Sexperts, an event to promote sexual health and knowledge.

Information about safer sex applies to all people, whether they are sexually active or not.

This year, the battle takes place at 7 p.m. Monday, Feb. 12, in the Union Courtyard.

Teams of three to five K-State students compete against each other in a battle of wits, sex trivia and condom expertise.

The Battle gives students the opportunity to test their knowledge in a fun and interesting way, as well as learn more about sex.

We smack a pair of beer goggles on team members and make them put lubed condoms on their hands, but this isn't only a battle for those with hours of condom practice.

Any student can form a team by going to the Lafene Web site at www.ksu.edu/lafene and clicking on the Battle of the Sexperts link.

Teams can register online and every participant gets a free T-shirt and the chance to win prizes from local businesses.

The team that drags along the most supporters wins a prize. Audience participation is always welcome, too.

If you still haven't satisfied your carnal cravings, don't worry. The Battle takes place during Sexual Responsibility Week, which is about safer sex, awareness and responsible choices.

Thursday, Feb. 15, will be yet another activity for you sex lovers.

The first Annual Sex Carnival will be set up with different educational activities and tables to peruse. Don't get excited though, there will be no demonstrations or asking for volunteers, unless, of course, you think you're a sexpert and could whip a condom on and off a banana.

SHAPE provides presentations to groups on and off campus, and can alter the length and content to the needs of each group.

To schedule a presentation, contact the Health Promotion Department at Lafene at 785-532-6595 or e-mail shape@ksu.edu, at least one week before the presentation date.

Presentations can be scheduled for teams participating in the Battle of the Sexperts as a warm-up before the fight. Remember to register your team now; the deadline is Feb. 1.

So whether you and your friends want to test your sex knowledge or you're just looking for some entertainment about sex (that isn't porn), the Battle of the Sexperts has something for everyone.

Sex Ed is a weekly column written by the members of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators and edited by Carol Kennedy, director of health promotions at Lafene Health Center. If you would like SHAPE to answer your sexual health question, please contact SHAPE at shape@ksu.edu.

'Ace' on fire

Decent action, sub-par plot will please target audience

'Smokin' Aces'

Album review by Brendan Praeger

With a high body count, a myriad of twisted characters and a decent serving of sharp dialogue, "Smokin' Aces" has enough up its sleeve to please its target audience.

Everyone else probably should reconsider before purchasing a ticket.

The premise is promising enough. Las Vegas showman Buddy "Aces" Israel (Jeremy Piven) decides to turn state's evidence and testify against the mob. This spurs the mob to put up a $1 million reward for his death with one catch — the mob boss also wants his heart.

With $1 million on the line, every top killer in the business wants a piece of Israel. Some of the contenders include a pair of female assassins who plan on sneaking in with Israel's steady stream of prostitutes, a trio of rednecks, neo-nazi brothers who prefer the more direct, guns-blazing approach and numerous other hit men who intend to use various disguises to reach the target.

Also in the hunt are a group of bail bondsmen led by Ben Affleck and a pair of FBI agents (Ray Liotta and Ryan Reynolds).

As far as action films go, every ingredient is provided for a huge array of gratuitous violence. This is the kind of stuff "Die Hard" fans dream of.

Although the action fan inside of me likes what he sees, the film snob inside of me is too cynical to let some things go.

"Smokin' Aces" has drawn a lot of comparisons to films by Guy Ritchie and Quentin Tarantino, but for the most part, the affiliation with classics like "Snatch" and "Pulp Fiction" are undeserved.

Sure, it has an ensemble cast of well-known actors, but the quantity-over-quality approach rarely gets the job done. Since most of the characters don't receive enough screen time for the audience to really connect with them, the film ends up having no protagonist. Some of the storylines are so underdeveloped it's puzzling why they were crammed into the film at all.

Jason Bateman and Ben Affleck have so little screen time their roles are more like glorified cameos. There's also a subplot where the survivor of a shooting escapes and finds help from an elderly nurse and her karate-obsessed, gangster wannabe grandson. It's mildly amusing at best, but since it's treated more like a chore than a break from the intense show-down at the hotel, it should have seen the light of day on DVD, not in the middle of an otherwise amusing gunfight.

The one actor who gets enough exposure to leave an impression, Jeremy Piven, doesn't disappoint. He's a drugged-out performer struggling with the fear of being assassinated and his anxiety about selling out his closest friends for a deal with the FBI. He's the only true villain in a movie with no real hero, and he doesn't put his time to waste.

It's hard to complain about a story line that throws a lot at you but never gets too complicated, things usually get jumbled when directors get to ambitious. Director Joe Carnahan (Narc) occasionally gets sidetracked, but usually manages to keep things moving towards the ending without plunging the audience into a state of confusion.

Just when things seem to be reaching a climax, the whole thing fizzles out with a weak payoff for a movie that deserved better. The twist ending is too predictable to be great, but Ryan Reynolds closes the film with an intense scene that makes me wish his character had enough screen time for me to actually care about his situation.

It may not be a prime example of good storytelling, but hey, it's an action movie, not an Oprah episode. If the thought of extreme violence and Alicia Keys dressed like a prostitute is enough to get you to a theater, "Smokin' Aces" is adequately amusing, although it might not be particularly memorable.

New Web site makes takeout easier

By George West
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For years college students have used online resources for things like e-mail, checking their grades or shopping for clothes.

Now they can order meals from various local restaurants with just the click of a mouse. One such local resource is WildcatMenus.com, a comprehensive restaurant and bar guide for the Manhattan area.

"It's a natural fit to be able to place a delivery order in between sending an e-mail and updating your (Facebook.com) profile," said Matt Hardy, sophomore in marketing. "So the convenience is there but more importantly than that, ordering online has tons of advantages over placing an order over the phone."

Hardy and Thomas Webb, junior in political science, started the site in January 2007. They started development in July 2006 and proceeded to spend the next six months talking to restaurant and bar owners and collecting menus.

More than 250 Web traffickers visit the site per day.

The developers said they've planned various events to help show their support for the community, and are joining the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

"As students, we also know how important it is to find the best deals at local restaurants," Hardy said. "To make that process easier, our entire site design is based around fantastic food specials from our restaurant clients."

For example, Domino's offers two small two topping pizzas and two 20-ounce drinks for $10. Super Bowl Sunday, The Pita Pit will offer three pitas, three bags of chips, and three drinks for $14.99.

"Instead of having to gather paper coupons from various places, students now just need to log on to our site, pick a restaurant, click on a coupon and that's it," Hardy said. "WildcatMenus.com is built on simplicity and prides itself on being created for the students, by the students."

Some students said the site seemed similar to other sites.

"It seems like www.campus- foods.com to me and I didn't care for it," Matt Young, senior in social science, said.

Others said they didn't think they would use it.

"I can see the benefit of it with respect to the menus and specials, but I doubt that I'll ever use it," Jake Fisher, senior in public relations, said.

However, Hardy said WildcatMenus is committed to Manhattan and to making the site better than previous sites.

Today's specials from www.wildcatmenus.com

- Domino's Pizza
2 small 2 topping pizzas and 2 20-oz. sodas for $10
- Hunan Chinese
Sizzlin' chicken rice soup for $3.85

"Flyboys" Inspired by the true story of the legendary Lafayette Escadrille, this action-packed epic tells the tale of America's first fighter pilots. These courageous young men distinguished themselves in a manner that none before them had dared, becoming true heroes who experience triumph, tragedy, love and loss amid the chaos of World War I.

"Facing the Giants" In six years of coaching, Grant Taylor (Alex Kendrick) never led his Shiloh Eagles to a winning season. After learning he and his wife, Brooke, face infertility, Grant discovers a group of fathers are secretly organizing to have him dismissed as head coach. Devastated by his circumstances, he cries out to God in desperation. When Grant receives a message from an unexpected visitor, he searches for a stronger purpose for his football team. He dares to challenge his players to believe God for the impossible on and off the field. When faced with unbelievable odds, the Eagles must step up to their greatest test of strength and courage.

"One Night With the King" "One Night With The King" chronicles the life of the young Jewish girl, Hadassah (Tiffany Dupont), who goes on to become the Biblical Esther, the Queen of Persia, and saves the Jewish nation from annihilation at the hands of its arch enemy while winning the heart of the handsome King Xerxes (Luke Goss).

"Beerfest" Two brothers travel to Germany for Oktoberfest, only to stumble upon secret, centuries-old competition described as a "Fight Club" with beer games. Featuring the Broken Lizard gang (Super Troopers).

"The Marine" Wherever there's danger, John Triton (John Cena) usually is smack dab in the middle of it ... and he doesn't play by rules. After he's unwillingly discharged from Iraq, Triton's wife Kate (Kelly Carlson) is kidnapped by merciless jewel thieves led by a vicious killer (Robert Patrick).

"Open Season" Boog (Martin Lawrence), a domesticated 900lb. Grizzly bear finds himself stranded in the woods 3 days before Open Season. Forced to rely on Elliot (Ashton Kutcher), a fast-talking mule deer, the two form an unlikely friendship and must quickly rally other forest animals if they are to form a rag-tag army against the hunters.

City to discuss changes to dog ordinance

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission work session Tuesday evening was for the dogs — dog owners, parents and anyone else, too.

The commission and city staff met to discuss potential amendments to the ordinance governing the ownership of dangerous dogs and receive comments from the public to be used in drafting future legislation. More than 60 people attended the session.

The amendments would make several requirements of Manhattan residents with dogs that are ruled to be dangerous under the ordinance and declare certain breeds always to be dangerous. Proposed breeds include the American Pit Bull Terrier and Wolf hybrids but not Rottweilers or Doberman Pinschers.

Lynn Schumacher, supervisor of the T. Russell Reitz Animal Shelter and Animal Control, said the reports of Rottweilers and Dobermans harming people have declined measurably in recent years while Pit Bulls and similar breeds have risen.

"We've got a Pomeranian that killed an infant in California," Schumacher said, "but the vast majority of the attacks are from these fighting breeds."

She said the annual number of Pit Bulls taken to the shelter after complaints of aggression has increased from 36 in 1999 to 139 in 2006.

Keepers of such dogs would have to keep them confined at home and leashed and muzzled in public, register them with the City Clerk, give the dogs identification microchips that are injected into the flesh and spay or neuter the dogs. Keepers also would have to pay an annual fee to keep such dogs and have a liability insurance policy with a single-incident amount of at least $100,000.

Ty Cobb, Manhattan resident, said he owns two Pit Bulls and would have to pay more than $12,000 over the next decade to cover the costs of insurance, licensing and other expenses to comply with the amended ordinance. He said the costs of the

Instructor teaches new class using Dr. Seuss' books as required reading

Ben Hedges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Associate professor of English Philip Nel stands at the front of his classroom with a book in his hand. An illuminated screen with a typed list of eight ways to look at the story glows behind him.

He opens the class for discussion, questioning the students about the themes and motifs of the book. His students begin breaking it down, talking about its ethnic and gender roles, stereotypes, general structure and prose.

The book?

"And to Think That I Saw it on Mulberry Street," by Dr. Seuss.

Nel is the instructor of a new class in the English department devoted completely to the life and works of Theodor Seuss Geisel, better known as Dr. Seuss. This is the first time in K-State's history the university has offered a class specifically on Dr. Seuss.

One could question how an entire semester could be devoted to the famous children's author, but Nel said it is harder to figure out what not to include.

"There's an enormous amount of material," Nel said. "The real challenge comes in squeezing it all into one semester."

The class doesn't just focus on his books however; it looks into his influences, style and politics.

"It's fun to take Seuss seriously," Nel said. "And that is something I hope to show with the class."

Because of his extensive research and devotion to Seuss, many consider Nel to be K-State's resident expert on all things Seuss.

He has written two books about the author, "Dr. Seuss: American Icon," published in 2004, and "The Annotated Cat: Under the Hats of Seuss and His Cats," published in 2007.

Nel said Seuss has been a part of his life since childhood.

"The first book that I could read by myself was Dr. Seuss' 'Green Eggs and Ham,'" Nel said.

Nel's parents were both immigrants from South Africa. He said his mother did not know of Seuss

Daughter of Czech rebel tells father's story

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"The Czech nation suffered under Hitler," said the daughter of a former Czechoslovakian rebel Tuesday night.

Barbara Masin told the story of her grandfather and father's fight to free Czechoslovakia from a communist regime in a speech at the K-State Student Union.

Masin was born in the United States and is the author of "Gauntlet," which tells the story of her father's fight for the freedom. She said her interest in her family's history started at a young age.

"I grew up hearing this as a bedtime story," she said, "I'm here to tell you a story today."

She started with the story of her grandfather, Gen. Josef Masin Sr., who fought communism in Czecho-slavakia as part of the Three Kings Organization. The group went after high-profile communist figures, bombed buildings and fought to try to free their country.

Josef Masin eventually was caught and executed, but a letter addressed to his two sons later was found in his prison cell.

"The first obligation of a conscious Czech is to fight for the freedom of his nation," Masin read from her grandfather's letter.

As the war continued, life in Czechoslovakia became more and more restricted, Masin said.

"If you visited a friend overnight, you had to get a stamp from the police station," she said, "and carrying a detailed map could be considered treason."

Barbara Masin's father, Josef Masin Jr., followed in his father's footsteps, fighting against communism along with his brother Radek, his friend Milan Paume and two other friends, she said.

The five men worked underground so their identities were unknown, Masin said. They caused so much havoc for the communist leaders that rumors of huge rebel armies started circulating.

Many of them were captured, but the Masin brothers were able to escape and move to the United States, she said, where they still live.

Though their father was canonized for his efforts, controversy still exists in the Czech Republic about whether the Masin sons can be considered heroes. Many questioned their morality, even though they used the exact same methods as their father, Barbara Masin said.

at K-State, helped to bring Masin to speak. He said it was a joint effort between the history department and the Institute of Military History and 20th Century Studies.

Maj. Tom Duncan, graduate student in security studies, said Barbara-Masin's speech was very informative.

"I believe that the study of history provides us useful alternatives for addressing the present-day issues," he said.

DIVERSIONS

A waste of time — but you might learn something

So many farts to choose from, so little air

Flatulence is a fact — a biological necessity, according to some sources — that everyone in the world experiences on a regular basis. And yet breaking wind in public remains taboo in most countries and cultures. This doesn't stop some unscrupulous individuals, accidentally or otherwise, from cutting loose in the presence of others.

Illustration by Donnie Lee

BIOLOGY OF A FART

The average human releases between one and three pints of "flatus" in 12-25 episodes throughout the day. The primary constituents of this are oxygen, nitrogen, hydrogen, carbon dioxide and methane — although sometimes a chemical reaction will also produce hydrogen sulfide. The latter is particularly unpleasant, as it is responsible for the rotten egg smell.

The noises commonly associated with flatulence are caused not by a flapping of the posterior, as commonly thought (unless the culprit is sitting heavily and pressing the buttocks together), but by vibrations of the anus itself. The sound varies depending on the tightness of the sphincter and the velocity of the gas being expelled, as well as other factors like moisture and body fat.

LESSER-KNOWN FARTS

Uproarious laughter can bring its own penalties for the farter, potentially leading to a loss of muscular control and a bout of further immoderate farting or worse.

THE WET FART

Known in some circles as "following through," the wet fart comes about when the delicate nerves of the rectum fail to correctly identify the composition of the material to be passed.

What was initially thought to be an ordinary fart (often, for some complex physiological reason, a silent one) proves to be partly or wholly composed of matter that is somewhat more substantial than hot air.

When this occurs in public, the effect can be devastating, although intestinal upsets such as amebic dysentery render the event entirely excusable.

THE COMBUSTIBLE FART

The principle constituents of flatus are highly flammable, and being the experimental creatures that humans are, some are tempted to set light to it, especially at parties.

While this practice is not recommended, one beneficial side effect is that the act of burning the gas seems to remove any unpleasant odors.

FARTING IN BED

When shared with a significant other, farting in bed can sound the death knell for a relationship.

That having been said, there are some couples who derive pleasure from deliberately trapping each other under the bed-sheets and forcing their partner to inhale the noxious cloud; a form of entertainment known as "Dutch Oven."

Agri-Industry Career Fair offers internship, job opportunities

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Agriculture students seeking both summer internships and full-time jobs were given a chance to explore a few of their options Tuesday afternoon.

From 11:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m., the ballroom in the K-State Student Union was converted for a fair for various agricultural companies to showcase what they offer. More than 65 companies from all areas of the industry were there.

There were several nationwide firms represented as well as more local companies. Tyson Foods, Inc. had a large table set up where they enticed passersby with koozies and other souvenirs.

Tyson was one firm that looked for both interns and full-time employees.

"Generally speaking we can find jobs for most who apply, as long as they are qualified," said Logan Maienschein, college relations manager for Tyson.

He said it largely depends on where the interests of the applicant lie and whether the applicant will be a good fit for the company.

Helena Chemical Company

also was looking for qualified students to participate in its summer internship program. Gary Grimm, business development specialist for Helena, talked to several applicants.

"We are looking for students who are most interested in the sales end of the chemical industry," Grimm said.

He said one purpose of the internship was to groom the interns for positions after they graduate.

Several students looked and stopped at the various booths and desks throughout the day.

Jeremy Kootz, sophomore in animal science and industry, said he went to the fair to check out his options for summer positions for the coming break.

"I really like how it is small enough to where it is not overwhelming, and it is still big enough that some big companies are here," Kootz said.

Other students were there looking for full-time jobs. Sara Wege, senior in animal science, was one such attendee.

"I am here looking for a company to work for when I graduate in December," Wege said. "I would like to find a job in the livestock sector."

"I also think that the fair is a wonderful resource for students to see what is available."

Houlihan's prepares to open next week

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If practice makes perfect, then Houlihan's will be good.

The new restaurant at the corner of 17th Street and Anderson Avenue has less than a week before it opens.

Houlihan's has a tall order to fill in that time, with training a full staff of servers, chefs and bartenders first.

Bridget McCombe, vice president of product development for Noble Hospitality, said the staff will be ready.

"We are cooking every item on the menu every day over and over and over," McCombe said.

Noble Hospitality is the company of Colin Noble, who owns the restaurant and the Holiday Inn hotel to which it is attached.

General manager Shane Allen said Houlihan's will be "leaps and bounds" ahead of Gold Fork, the restaurant that used to operate in the same location. Gold Fork closed in fall 2006 as a part of the remodeling project that started more than a year ago and changed what used to be the Ramada Plaza Hotel to its current incarnation.

"You're going to taste things you've never tasted before," Allen said.

He said the restaurant will cook almost entirely from scratch and provide different sorts of fare.

One item Allen said will be popular are "flights" of drinks, where customer gets three different small margaritas, glasses of wine or other spirits so they can try new tastes.

Allen also said the restaurant's dessert menu, with small, $2 treats instead of the giant confections found at most high-end eateries, will be popular with customers.

"You go somewhere like Chili's or Applebee's and you get this mound when you're probably already full," Allen said. "It just makes sense."

The restaurant's desserts fit on one small card while its menus list several pages of drinks, appetizers and entrées. The items are described in a humorous and ornate language and include a few jokes and the occasional fake product.

For example, "Bottle with a ship in it" is listed with wines. It's described as "Available somewhere. Not sure where."

There still was a bit of remodeling to do Wednesday afternoon, but the interior is nearly done. Allen said everything would be done and the staff would be prepared before opening day rolls around.

Before that happens, though, he said the restaurant will be having plenty of practice and has invited a few people to come in and test the employees. Allen said the purpose is to "help us lose our training wheels."

He said the restaurant has hired 70 servers, 45 chefs and 12 bartenders. Experienced employees and trainers, or "professors," as their shirts say, were flown in from other restaurants in the chain and started teaching Sunday.

Kasia Wojnar, a "professor" who serves at a Houlihan's in Philadelphia, stood watch over several tables filled with servers taking quizzes. She said they take quizzes each day on the previous day's lessons to see what needs more attention.

Wojnar said the menu presented a small challenge.

"There's so much information on it, but they're getting it — they're good," Wojnar said.

'Abortion Diaries' to help others empathize with women who abort

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The experiences of 12 women and their decisions to abort their pregnancies will be the topic of interest tonight at the Manhattan Public Library.

A screening of the 30-minute documentary "The Abortion Diaries" will begin at 7 p.m. at the library, 629 Poyntz Ave.

The event is sponsored by the Manhattan chapter of the National Organization for Women and the K-State women's studies program.

According to NOW's official Web site, the organization is the largest, most comprehensive feminist advocacy group in the United States.

The group stands against all oppression, recognizing that racism, sexism and homophobia are interrelated, that other forms of oppression such as classism and ableism work together with these three to keep power and privilege concentrated in the hands of a few, according to the site.

Debbie Nuss, member of NOW, said she found out about "The Abortion Diaries" through a NOW e-mail.

She said she contacted director Penny Lane after receiving an e-mail about screening the documentary.

Nuss said Lane interviewed 12 women about what it was like to make the decision to have an abortion and how they have felt since that time.

"For me, this is a very compelling documentary," Nuss said.

Nuss said she thinks it is more difficult for women to make the decision to have an abortion today because the issue has become so political as opposed to private.

"Women are discouraged from talking about the issue," she said.

"Once people see this movie and really hear these women's voices and hear the human side of it, they may sympathize and realize the issue is more than a political volleyball."

Angela Hubler, director of the Department of Women's Studies, said she wants students and members of the community to understand what it is like for women going through an abortion since the issue is fairly common but not publicly discussed.

Nuss said she and Hubler will lead a discussion after the screening.

She said Manhattan is the first community in Kansas to be host to a screening of "The Abortion Diaries."

TO THE POINT Staff shares favorite Suess books

In honor of the semester's new course on the writings of Theodor Geisel, the members of the editorial staff share their favorite Dr. Seuss books.

Jacque Haag: "The Foot Book," because my mom bought it for me, and we used to read it together all the time. I'm pretty sure I spoke in rhyme for at least three years.

Jessi Hernandez: "How the Grinch Stole Christmas," without a doubt. I love the diction, with words like "nimble" and "puzler." It always brings a great Grinchy grin to my face.

Eileen Laux: "Oh, the Places You'll Go," because my oldest sister gave it to me when I graduated high school. My sisters and I each have one for a "growing up" milestone in our lives - it's kind of a tradition.

Jonathan Garten: "Did I Ever Tell You How Lucky You Are?" because my father passed down a first edition, autographed copy of the book to me. It's hella cool.

Alex Peak: "Oh, the Places You'll Go," because it's the only Dr. Seuss book I've taken the time to read, and my best friend from grade school gave it to me at my eighth-grade graduation.

Megan Moser: "Green Eggs and Ham," I have fond memories of my dad making green eggs for my sisters and me after reading it.

Jonas Hogg: "The Sneetches and Other Stories," because any story translated by NATO and distributed to 500,000 children in Bosnia and Herzegovina just has to be good - and because I want a star on my belly.

Scott Girard: "If I Ran the Zoo," because I loved the variety of animals Seuss created, even if they did look like creatures from a bad acid dream.

Brendan Praeger: "The Lorax," because of the religious allegory and because I love thneeds. A thneed is something that everyone needs.

Logan C. Adams: "Hop on Pop," because I got it when I was very young and because it inspired me to find new ways to have fun. My father was not amused.

Donnie Lee: "Horton Hatches the Egg," because what's funnier than an elephant sitting on an egg? I mean, it's an elephant. He sits on an egg, and it hatches. Brilliant!

Heidi Paulson: "The Butter Battle Book" - it exposes how silly it is to fight over the small things. I remember my parents emphasizing the need to accept everyone.

Seeing double

Hit films from past ruined by big-name remakes

There is a tragedy happening in this great country of ours.

Hollywood is getting its "quick fix" from the old school generation, and it needs to end.

There are a lot of things in this world that there are too many of: Paris Hilton look-alikes, Christmas decorations that come out in October and horrible movie remakes.

While look-alikes and Christmas decorations are annoying but relatively harmless, remakes threaten the very creative foundation of Hollywood.

Movie re-makes are often shot with a big name in one of the lead roles, in hopes the public will come see their beloved celebrity on the big screen.

For "The Omen," it was Julia Stiles and for "War of the Worlds" it was the biggest of big stars, Tom Cruise.

While Mr. Cruise is known for his action roles, he could not make "War of the Worlds" match up to the original, which debuted in 1953 with a then-large budget of $2 million ($13 million in 2005 dollars).

Most remakes, much like these two, don't measure up to the original films. In fact, "War of the Worlds" was so horrible it couldn't make the public forget about Cruise's concurrent trip down Looney Lane. Surely there is something wrong when the public is unable to forgive celebrities for their endearing drug additions or apparent insanity.

These films even further disgrace the originals by monopolizing their past success.

Sketchy remakes that are hurriedly done simply for a profit are popping up faster than butt implants in Miami and this trend needs to stop before it is too late.

According to the Internet Movie Database (imdb.com) "The Omen," originally released in 1976, won an Academy Award for best original score and was nominated for best original song.

The Golden Globes and the Grammy Awards also nominated "The Omen" for best male acting debut and best album of original score.

Gregory Peck accepted the lead role as Robert Thorn, after not having had an acting assignment for five years. He got 10 percent of the box office profits and made about $5 million.

The re-make, made in 2006 and released on June 6, 2006

(6-6-6, the supposed Devil's number), has received zilch for Academy Award or Golden Globe nominations.

"The Omen" and "War of the Worlds" are two of the many examples of movies that have provided the base for remakes, prequels, sequels or TV shows throughout the years.

Many of the movies that are reproduced have their original magic and appeal taken away as they are shoved aside for newer versions that have more special effects and current recognizable actors and actresses, but when it comes down to it, neither of these factors are really what makes a movie worth seeing.

Hollywood needs to start turning out fresh and new script and screenplay ideas instead of recycling old ones out of laziness and hopes of a guaranteed hit.

The movies of "Old Hollywood" need to be preserved and remembered for the box office hits that they were, not for how they could be made differently or with more gratuitous sex in the 21st century.

Politics disgust me. I dislike everything about the process - the mud-slinging tactics, the empty promises, the whole shebang.

Politicians inspire disgust and distrust. I scrutinize their votes and political moves, wondering if they truly care. But this week, student senate has made me wonder.

ANNETTE LAWLESS

From Monday to Friday, members of Student Governing Association have launched a week of student appreciation through their "SGA Hears You" campaign.

Members of SGA said the campaign is to increase the visibility of SGA, to provide additional information about its events and to help others learn how to become one of them.

Don't get me wrong. I don't hate student senate, just the politics. I can't get past the belief that behind every politician is a scandal waiting to erupt.

Maybe I am making student senators sound like the scum of the earth. But it's hard to look behind the stipends, speakeasies and extracurricular activities without judging a teeny bit.

As a former student senator, I'll admit I enjoyed being a part of the elite. Every week, I would swoop into the K-State Student Union and plop into a plush chair in the Big 12 Room.

I dreamt of changes with diversity programming and student mentor programs. But as I went to meetings, I realized any monkey in a power-suit could disguise themselves as a senator.

The power was an illusion, but most student senators are effective leaders.

Though their mentalities are quite chipper and annoying, their attitude does promote excellence at K-State. Add some funnel cakes and a Ferris wheel, and I bet they'd think senate is the happiest place on earth.

The group has made a huge effort to reach out to the student body. I commend senators for their positive marketing scheme.

I encourage you to take advantage of the "SGA Hears You" campaign. Talk to your senators; get to know the people who spend your money.

Maybe you'll be lucky and find a senator who will hear what you have to say. Or if anything, you might get a free T-shirt or cookie out of the deal.

Excuses, excuses

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Students work out on the exercise bikes and the two indoor tracks at the Peters Recreation Complex. This is the Rec's busiest time of the year with several students trying to get in shape for spring break.

Rec crowdedness should not prevent completion of resolutions

The countdown continues. Only 44 days until spring break.

So it's not surprising that Peters Recreation Complex is at its busiest. This time every spring semester, as students push to follow through with their New Year's resolutions and get bodies worthy of showing off during spring break, the number of people at the Rec grows.

I'm sure many of you can attest to this phenomenon, as those who attempt to go to the Rec between the hours of 4 p.m. and midnight will likely wait their turn to use a multitude of machines.

What's more, some must brave a long walk through cold and blustery parking lots before even joining the masses inside. To these poor souls, I say, be optimistic and consider it more exercise.

In any case, how can we solve this inconvenient predicament? The only real option besides building a new addition onto the Rec to facilitate more exercise equipment is to simply deal with it.

I know that's not the answer you wanted, but until we elect leaders who are health-conscious and bold enough to propose such an idea, it's really the only answer.

However, if you do choose to exercise at the Rec during the evening, there are ways to speed up your workout so you don't waste a lot of time waiting for equipment to become unoccupied. Here are some suggestions.

- Bench press
Instead of using one of the four conventional bench presses available at the Rec, hop on the incline or decline bench presses. These machines allow you to work a majority of the same muscle fibers in your pectoralis major and are far less popular than flat benches.

If the angled benches are occupied, try using dumbbells or one of the three Cybex machines that implement the bench press motion.

■ Leg press

Many people shy away from squatting to work their legs and instead choose to use a leg press machine. That's exactly why you shouldn't.

Squatting is the king of leg workouts, so try to snag one of the two squat racks available at the Rec Complex.

If they are busy, use the Smith machine to perform a squatting motion. Dumbbell squats and lunges are other great ways to kick your legs into shape.

■ Elliptical machine

The elliptical machines are by far the most widely used cardio equipment at the rec complex. It's no surprise that it's almost impossible to use one any time after 5 p.m.

Don't forget there are treadmills on which to run and walk, stationary bikes to ride and also Indoor Rowers to use.

If these machines are full, check upstairs or at the very west end of the building for unoccupied cardio equipment. The Rec also has two great indoor tracks.

Scheduling issues, fatigue not acceptable excuses

February is fast approaching, and it is during this time students begin studying for the first round of exams. We've written several papers, thumbed through hundreds of textbook pages and wasted lots of ink printing notes.

Has the commotion of this spring semester caused you to rustle up new excuses for skipping the physical activity part of your day? What excuse have you used lately?

Excuse No. 1: "I just don't have time." Time is a common excuse, but today is a great day to overcome that dilemma and make fitness a new priority. Try to multi-task; read your notes while riding the bike or make those necessary phone calls while walking.

Excuse No. 2: "I'm too tired to work out." Despite what you might think about exercise, it actually gives you more energy.

No, it might not be an energy boost at the start, but as you push through the discomfort, you begin to feel better and the work becomes easier.

If exercise seems difficult for most of your workout, consider giving yourself a longer warm-up before increasing the weight or resistance.

Excuse No. 3: "I'm not seeing the results I wanted, so why bother exercising?" The media plays a big part in how we see ourselves physically. We want immediate gratification and results yesterday with as little effort and time involvement as possible.

Realize quick fitness is short-lived. Developing and maintaining physical activity result in gradual changes that last a lifetime when hard work is involved.

Excuse No. 4: "I just don't like to sweat." As amusing as this might be for some, it is a common excuse among females in particular. There are things we do despite how we feel about them because of specific outcomes or benefits.

The benefits of exercise outweigh the consequences we face if we do not work out. Keep your future in mind and rise above emotions.

Listen to your body, however, when it tells you to take a break due to injury, illness or over-training.

If redoing your hair and makeup create time issues, then try to work out for a shorter period of time and with higher intensity.

Consider changing your workout time to mornings so you can avoid showering twice in one day.

Before you use an excuse to skip your workout this week, try to remember the benefits you'll be missing out on.

ROW | Men's crew team announces 2 open practices

The K-State men's club crew team will hold open tryouts Thursday and Friday for anyone who is interested in joining the team.

Coach Ben Higgins said anyone wanting to join the crew team could meet him at the south end of the K-State Student Union parking lot at 5:45 p.m. on Thursday and Friday. The practices last from 6-8 p.m.

Higgins suggested wearing a couple layers of athletic clothing and tennis shoes.

BKN | Iverson out for tonight's game with sprained ankle

DENVER — Nuggets guard Allen Iverson will miss Wednesday's game against the Trail Blazers in Portland after spraining his right ankle.

Iverson

Iverson was injured in the Nuggets' 105-101 loss to the Charlotte Bobcats on Monday night in Denver.

The Nuggets said Iverson did not travel with the team Tuesday. Iverson averages 27.1 points and 7.7 assists a game since joining the Nuggets.

Denver coach George Karl said Iverson didn't get on the court at all Tuesday at the morning shoot around before the team departed for Portland.

Although Iverson's absence was a blow, Karl was more concerned Tuesday over his team's recent play on defense. The team is giving up 103.9 points a game, which is 27th in the league. Denver gave up 105 points to the Bobcats, which is 10 more than their season average.

"Losing is a good teacher," Karl said. "We spent some time watching film. We had a spicy defensive practice. We didn't do much offense at all."

Karl doesn't understand why the Nuggets can't play better defense. It's a source of frustration.

"You've got to be alert and active," Karl said. "The scouting reports and concepts — we'll figure out how to give you help. If you're not going to be alert and active, and you're going to be slow and lazy, we're in trouble. It's tough coaching slow and lazy. Alert and active is good."

WRE | Herpes outbreak suspends high school wrestling in Minnesota

MINNEAPOLIS — High school wrestling was suspended Tuesday across Minnesota due to a widespread outbreak of a skin infection. The Minnesota State High School League said 10 teams reported 24 cases of herpes gladiatorum. The virus is spread by skin-to-skin contact. Symptoms have included lesions on the face, head and neck of wrestlers.

The league banned competitions and direct contact between wrestlers in practice until Feb. 6.

The suspension is meant to control the current outbreak, allow time to diagnose new cases and prevent disqualifications at the state tournament, scheduled for Feb. 28-March 3.

The Minnesota Department of Health has been tracking the virus, caused by herpes simplex type 1, the same strain that causes cold sores.

Officials first became aware of the outbreak at a tournament held in Rochester in late December. Scot Davis, a wrestling coach at Owatonna High School, was involved in wrestling in Minnesota for more than 40 years and said he can't remember the league completely shutting down.

Davis' team, which gets doctor checkups several times a week, competed at the Rochester tournament where the outbreak was first detected, yet none of his wrestlers have been infected. He applauded the suspension.

"I think it's a bold step," he said. "How else are you going to get this thing cleared up? How do I explain to a mom that her kid has herpes forever?"

Steve Larsen, wrestling coach at Century High School in Rochester, said his team will miss three competitions because of the eight-day suspension.

"It's going to make scheduling interesting," he said. "I hope some of it will get rescheduled."

The Century team has had no skin problems this year, Larsen said. But in the past, when a few of his wrestlers came down with ringworm, his team was suspended from practice and competition as a precaution.

Infected wrestlers will sit out matches and get cleared by doctors before they can resume wrestling, he said.

Dr. B.J. Anderson, a former wrestler who acts as a health adviser to the high school league, blames the outbreak on doctors who have been misdiagnosing and inappropriately treating the viral infections as bacterial ones.

"(Doctors) are not doing the right tests," he said.

Anderson said the greatest concern is an infection of the eye, which can, in rare cases, lead to scarring or blindness. The virus can remain in a body indefinitely, he said.

A similar outbreak occurred in 1999, affecting 63 wrestlers and disqualifying several of them from the state tournament, Anderson said.

Dr. Henry Balfour, a national expert on herpes who works in the department of virology at the University of Minnesota, said wrestlers are at a higher risk for this sort of infection than other people because of the nature of the sport.

"Usually you have to have damage to the skin," he said. "If there is a break in the skin, ... then the virus could take and cause a skin infection."

ARTIST | Student chooses art despite parents' wishes

two years, she worked with Sherry Haar, associate professor of apparel textiles and interior design, on wearable art.

Haar said their relationship began as a professional relationship and evolved into a friendship.

Haar said they discussed Nguyen's passion for drawing, and Haar shared advice with her.

"Do whatever makes you happy, not your parents," she told.

Initially Nguyen started at K-State as a graphic design major.

"I figured it was the money-making side of art and something my parents would be pleased with," she said.

After two years, she decided to switch to marketing but said she soon found she didn't like the business side of it.

"While I was a marketing major, it was my DSP project that kept me connected to art," Nguyen said.

Nguyen changed her major twice before finding her passion in an art class she was taking for fun.

Figure Drawing I was the class that inspired her to become an artist, she said.

"In this class I remembered how much I loved to draw," she said.

Nguyen is now in the process of applying for graduate school.

She said it has been a pretty stressful project, along with organization obligations and schoolwork.

Most schools require 20 slides of work that illustrate the ability she has for concentration in graduate school, she said. During the application process, she said she became her own worst critic.

She said there is no right or wrong answer with art because it's based on opinion.

"One person may see a piece and think it is horrible, and another person may think the same piece is beautiful," she said. "It is in the eye of the beholder."

Anita Cortez, director of the DSP, said a particular canvas painting she has in her office exemplifies Nguyen's passion for her work.

"Its darker, outer edges are turbulent and chaotic but are balanced by a womb-like center," Cortez said.

She said this piece also describes a piece of Nguyen's personality.

"The womb-like center is very representative of the force within Kieu," she said. "The center is the nurturing part of the painting holding back the chaos. She is a very nurturing person."

Through her journey, Nguyen said she is most proud of her independence.

"I have paid for college myself, and I am learning to be more and more independent," she said.

She said she found the courage to be independent and pursue her own goals - not goals that were set for her. Through this learning process, she has learned to take time out for her to accomplish what she needs.

"I felt like I was ignoring that inner voice you hear when you're doing the wrong thing," she said.

DOG | Ordinance change might force owners to pay

law could run high for the city, as well, and named several urban areas that spend hundreds of thousands of dollars enforcing similar laws.

The current ordinance only declares dogs as dangerous once they're known by their keepers to "have a propensity, tendency or disposition to attack unprovoked," or to be otherwise dangerous to people or domestic animals. It lists the keepers of several breeds, including American Pit Bull Terriers, Rottweilers and Chows, as being held to a higher standard in knowing if their dog is dangerous.

The amended ordinance would eliminate the need for the keeper of a dog to know about any bad tendencies for the animal to be determined dangerous. It also would create an expedited hearing process in municipal court to determine if a dog is dangerous.

Lori Neer of the Manhattan Kennel Club said the proposed amendments would be counterproductive. She said keeping such breeds locked up at home and leashed and muzzled in public would deny the dogs any opportunity to learn to behave.

Neer said the MKC provides training for dog owners but is forbidden by their insurance company from training dogs considered "dangerous" under the law, so the proposal would prevent those breeds from being trained.

She said there would be more truly dangerous dogs not less, and she added that people who own such breeds are labeled unfairly as not caring about public safety.

"If they have the audacity to speak up, they are written off as crazy dog people who care more about dogs than people," Neer said.

Commissioner Mark Hatesohl said he had reservations about the proposal and that accidents still will happen despite any laws.

"My concern is that we're going to do a knee-jerk overreaction, and a lot of this seems like overkill," Hatesohl said.

The interest in amending the ordinance springs from an incident in November 2006, when several loose, aggressive dogs around Theodore Roosevelt Elementary School antagonized people in the area. A court case is still pending from the incident.

Cheryl Strecker, Manhattan resident, said she lived six blocks from the school, and she and her two children have been approached by loose dogs in the area that acted aggressively toward them. She said she wanted the commission to consider a complete ban on breeds with aggressive tendencies instead of current proposal.

"Every law that we have in this society restricts individual rights - that's why we have them," Strecker said. "You can't drive 35 mph in a school zone. There's a reason for that."

Mayor Bruce Snead said a task force will be formed from advocates of both sides of the argument to report back to the commission with recommendations for action.

SEUSS | Course stresses importance of children's lit

until she discovered his books in the public library. Nel said she was taken in by the humor and images of Seuss and brought every book home for him to read.

"That's where it all began," Nel said.

Nel said the inspiration for him to delve deeper into the work of Seuss came while he was pursuing his doctoral degree in English at Vanderbilt University.

A biography called "Dr. Seuss and Mr. Geisel," by Judith and Neil Morgan, led him to write a chapter in his dissertation about Seuss.

"It made me realize that you could do a lot more with Dr. Seuss and with children's literature in general," Nel said.

Nel's class attracted the interest of many students. Two weeks into the class, the room is still full of students with notebooks and pencils in hand.

Katie Pearson and Britni Kelly, both seniors, said they took the class out of sheer curiosity.

"I needed a 600-level American literature class, and I thought it would be fun to take," said Kelly, an English major.

Pearson, majoring in secondary education and English, said she heard about the deeper meaning in Seuss' work and was curious what a class about him would be like.

"It's Dr. Seuss," she said. "And Dr. Seuss is cool."

Nel said he strongly believes that not only Seuss but children's literature in general is important to teach in the college setting. In addition to his Seuss class, he teaches two sections of Literature for Children and has instructed a Harry Potter's Library class in past semesters.

"Children's literature may be the most important literature you ever read," Nel said. "This is the stuff that you read before you've figured out who you are, before you've made up your mind on all sorts of subjects."

"This is the literature that shapes you more than anything else."

Ethanol's environmental effects polarize legislators on Bush plan

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Environmental and energy security goals have a way of clashing.

Federal regulators find themselves under new pressure to better protect Americans from asthma and other lung ailments aggravated by smog. At the same time, President Bush is promoting an energy policy that relies on more smog-producing ethanol.

"This is ethanol's dirty little secret: it can cause more smog," said Frank O'Donnell, president of Clean Air Watch, an advocacy group.

Nearly 160 million people now breathe illegal levels of ozone pollution — smog — mostly in and around major cities in California and the East. Scientists with the Environmental Protection Agency will recommend even tougher standards today.

Such a step, they say in a document obtained by The Associated Press, "would provide greater health protection for sensitive groups, including asthmatic children and other people with lung disease, healthy children and older adults — especially those active outdoors, and outdoor workers."

"The overall body of evidence on ozone health effects clearly calls into question the adequacy of the current standard," EPA scientists say in their final recommendation to Administrator Stephen Johnson, a Bush appointee.

What the scientists will recommend has stirred controversy within the EPA, said a senior government official, speaking on condition of anonymity because he wasn't authorized to speak about the subject.

EPA staff members have felt they were under pressure from administration officials, including people at the White House, not to give a specific recommendation for tightening the standard, the official said.

Bush, in his State of the Union speech last week, urged Americans to reduce gasoline use by 20 percent over 10 years by substituting alternative fuels, mainly ethanol. The ethanol would be in gasoline blends of 10 to 85 percent.

Smog is produced mainly when tailpipe and smokestack pollutants react with summer heat. Other major sources of the pollution are gas vapors and chemical solvents.

Stricter standards could make it even more difficult for states and counties to comply with the Clean Air Act. Billions of dollars might have to be spent on cleaner-burning factories, power plants and cars and more mass transportation.

Johnson has until June 20 to decide what to do with the recommendation, agency spokeswoman Jennifer Wood said Tuesday.

Last year, the EPA was sued for ignoring its scientists' recommendations for tighter restrictions on soot, fine particles from smokestacks and tailpipes that contribute to premature deaths and respiratory illness.

A federal appeals court in December struck down the Bush administration's strategy for reducing smog, saying it allowed "backsliding" by states instead of making them order new pollution controls on industrial plants, more public transportation, tougher vehicle inspection programs or cleaner-burning gasoline.

Ethanol, a focus of Bush's gasoline-reduction plan, helps cut carbon monoxide in winter but can raise smog levels in summer, air pollution experts say. Ethanol releases more nitrogen oxides, a key element of smog, and evaporates more easily than gasoline, adding other air pollutants.

EPA documents show more ethanol use could raise smog levels about 1 percent, mainly in parts of the Midwest that don't use cleaner-burning reformulated gasoline.

"If you're a state air pollution official trying to lower the smog, that's not helpful," said A. Blake-eman Early, a lobbyist for the American Lung Association.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wearing a mauve crocheted hat and black-framed designer glasses, her soft-spoken but energetic voice relapsed to when she began her journey of independence and free self-expression.

She is the daughter of refugees from Vietnam who came to the United States to make something of their family. Kieu Nguyen, fifth-year senior in fine arts, said she struggled with finding her passion in life and being accepted by her parents.

"My parents had drive to dream for something bigger for their children," she said.

One of her ongoing struggles throughout life has been fighting for support from her parents to pursue art.

"Drawing is my true passion," she said.

Coming from a family of nine siblings who all graduated from K-State with honors and degrees in the fields of math and science, Nguyen said she felt pressure to meet their expectations.

"I felt like I was ignoring that inner voice you hear when you're doing the wrong thing."

"Everything I do has to be top-notch," she said. "If it means that I will not sleep, not eat, to do it well then that is what I will do."

Nguyen said her parents wanted her to be a doctor or enter a profession that makes money.

"To my parents, art is a hobby, not a career," she said.

Even now when her family sees her artwork, she said they do not appreciate it for what it is.

"They want decorative art. They want something pretty and colorful," she said.

Her artwork is the total opposite, with dark strokes that show a lot of emotion, she said.

Nguyen said she wants to bring attention to minority, immigrant and women issues through appealing to viewers' emotions through her art.

"I want to be an advocate," she said, "In a way I feel I am giving a voice to those who are not necessarily heard."

She explained that drawing is her personal calling.

"Art gives me the opportunity to release what I feel inside," she said.

As a child, Nguyen said she always looked for a way to release creative energy.

"I usually was inside drawing or making something, instead of playing outside with the rest of the kids," she said.

Aquarius

Make plans to meet again in the near future. Your self-esteem will return if you take part in organizational functions that allow you to be in the limelight. Friday will be your lucky day.

Aries

Romantic encounters are evident through travel or educational pursuits. You will be able to pick up on future trends if you keep your eyes peeled for unique ideas. Friday will be your lucky day.

Cancer

You can offer your help to others but back off if they appear to be offended by your persistence. Lovers may prove unworthy of your affection. Thursday will be your lucky day.

Capricorn

Look into physical activities that will help get rid of some of that tension you may be feeling. Pamper yourself; you deserve it. Tuesday will be your lucky day.

Gemini

Make those phone calls. You are ready to blow up and your stress level is in overdrive. Don't let emotions interfere with professional integrity. Tuesday will be your lucky day.

Libra

You need to pamper yourself. You can make changes that will enhance your appearance. Help if you can, but more than likely it will be sufficient just to listen. Friday will be your lucky day.

Pisces

You can get others to do things for you, but be sure not to overpay them or lend them money. Get involved in groups that offer intellectual stimulation. Sunday will be your lucky day.

Leo

You can have quite the romantic adventure if you take time to get to know your mate all over again. Relationships will be emotional this week. Monday will be your lucky day.

Scorpio

You could experience unusual circumstances and meet eccentric individuals. Your outgoing nature might work against you. Sunday will be your lucky day.

Sagittarius

Organization will be the key to avoiding discord. Don't count your chickens before they hatch. Organize your week to avoid any setbacks that might ignite temper flare-ups. Sunday will be your lucky day.

Taurus

Your creative imagination will help you in coming up with unique ideas. Creative projects could turn into moneymaking ventures. You can make alterations to your appearance everyone will admire. Monday will be your lucky day.

Virgo

Watch for empty promises that may give you false hope. Spend time getting into physical activities with your lover. Jealousy may be a contributing factor to your emotional ups and downs. Tuesday will be your lucky day.

Beasley

Michael Beasley — 6-foot-9, 235-pound power forward
Notre Dame Prep School — Fitchburg, Mass.

Beasley is averaging 24 points and 14 rebounds for the Crusaders, who had a busy week.

Notre Dame Prep played six games in nine days, and now stand at 23-2. The recent stretch included games at the Community College of Rhode Island and Dean College, traditionally two of the better Division 3 Junior College teams in the Northeast.

Chris Maza of the Fitchburg Sentinel & Enterprise contributed.

Brown

Fred Brown — 6-foot-3, 185-pound shooting guard
William T. Dwyer High School — West Palm Beach, Fla.

It was an up-and-down weekend for Brown and the Panthers, who went 1-1. On Friday, Brown could not find his shooting touch and finished with 13 points on 4-of-24 field goals in a 58-50 loss to Palm Beach Lakes High School.

As much as he struggled Friday, he more than made up for it Saturday. Brown just missed a triple-double with 26 points, 10 assists, and seven steals in an 80-70 upset of Palm Beach Gardens.

"Fred really bounced back for us," Dwyer coach Fred Ross said.

Palm Beach Gardens was the No. 1-ranked Class 6A team in the state. Brown is averaging 19.2 points for the Panthers, who are 15-7 but still unranked.

Pullen

Jacob Pullen — 6-foot-1, 175-pound point guard
Proviso East High School — Maywood, Ill.

Pullen's Proviso East High School went 2-0 over the weekend, winning 55-46 over Morton on Saturday and 54-44 against Hinsdale South on Friday.

In the victory over Hinsdale South, Pullen led the Pirates with 21 points. Proviso East moved to 17-3 and 8-0 in the West Suburban Gold Conference, but remained No. 10 in the Chicago Sun-Times' latest Top-25 poll.

The Chicago Sun-Times contributed.

Sutton

Dominique Sutton — 6-foot-4, 195-pound small forward
The Patterson School — Lenoir, N.C.

The Patterson School only had one game scheduled the past week, a matchup with Pfeiffer Junior College Monday that was cancelled. The Bulldogs played Charif Prep Tuesday night, a team they beat 102-83 earlier in the season.

Sutton is averaging 15 points and eight rebounds per game for the Bulldogs, who are 23-2 this season.

Off the Court with Luis Colon

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Luis Colon, a 6-foot-10 freshman, made the trip from Puerto Rico to play basketball in Manhattan. He has no regrets, except he hates cold weather, especially snow. After being ejected from a game Nov. 29 for punching the back of a California player's head, coach Bob Huggins recommended Colon keep his hands to himself. Colon recently answered questions ranging from his favorite cologne to what he misses about Puerto Rico.

Q. Do old people you don't know ask if you play basketball?
A. Yeah, all the time. They come up to me out of nowhere and say, 'you're pretty tall. You should play basketball.'

Q. If you could date any movie star, who would it be?
A. Jennifer Lopez, because she's Puerto Rican.

Q. How many headbands do you have?
A. I can't even tell you. I throw one away after every game, on the court or off the court. It depends on my mood.

Q. What do you miss most about Puerto Rico?
A. The people, the parties, the beach, the sun, the weather — everything.

Q. Why did you want to play for Huggins?
A. He's a tough guy, and he is going to make me a better player.

Q. What is one thing most people might not know about Huggins?
A. Even though he is a tough coach, he cares a lot about the players.

Q. What kind of cologne do you wear?
A. Armani or Bora Bora. Mostly Bora Bora.

Q. Do you play as yourself in video games?
A. No, I hate to. I always break the controller.

Q. What did you learn from getting ejected from a game?
A. The referees are soft here.

Sister of former K-State player shines with Buffaloes

COURTESY MISSOURI SPORTS INFORMATION

Junior Jackie McFarland plays for Colorado and is the sister of former Wildcat Jessica McFarland. Colorado will host K-State tonight at 8.

By Dayne Logan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When K-State takes the floor tonight in Boulder, Colo., it will be the first time in two years only one McFarland will be on the teams' combined rosters.

For the last two seasons media have hyped the sister-against-sister showdown that pitted former K-State center Jessica McFarland against her younger sister, Jackie, who plays for the Colorado Buffaloes.

Jackie might not be playing against her sister this year, but she's having no trouble making the headlines on her own.

McFarland, a junior forward, is ranked in the top three of the Big 12 Conference in numerous categories. She is third in the conference in scoring with an average of 18.7 points per game, second in rebounds per game with 10.7 and leads the conference in shooting percentage, averaging 63.4 percent from the field.

"Anybody shooting the ball at 60 percent from the floor in our league, when everybody knows who you are and what you bring to the floor, is just tremendous," K-State coach Deb Patterson said.

Because of Jessica McFarland, Patterson has known about Jackie longer than just about everyone. However, Patterson said K-State did not recruit her very heavily.

"Every individual is unique and distinct in their desires and what interests them," Patterson said. "For us it was Jessica, and for (Colorado) it was Jackie."

Patterson's players agreed the two sisters are very different in both their desires and their playing styles.

"Jackie's more of a finesse type of player. Jessica's more of a brute," Claire Coggins said.

Unlike McFarland, Wildcat guard and Colorado native Kimberly Dietz was on the recruiting radars of both K-State and Colorado.

"(Colorado) was a great program — I just kind of wanted to get away from home," Dietz said.

However, Dietz said she is looking forward to her homecoming.

"I'm a family person and it definitely makes the Colorado trip a little more exciting," she said.

Women's update

1. No. 9 Oklahoma — After rolling through the first seven games of Big 12 Conference play, the Sooners stumbled at home against upset-minded Texas A&M. The Aggies used a late 13-0 run to end Oklahoma's record-setting 26-game win streak against Big 12 opponents. However, the Sooners are still a game up on the rest of the league and are the clear favorite to come out on top.

2. No. 13 Baylor — The Bears appear to have found their groove and are riding a three-game winning streak into tonight's game against Missouri. In two road games last week, Baylor won at Texas (63-59) and at Oklahoma State (66-55). Bernice Mosby averaged 23 points and 10.5 rebounds in the two victories, and she is on the crest of leading her team back to the Top 10.

3. No. 22 Nebraska — The Huskers rebounded from a 66-65 setback at Texas A&M by pounding Kansas 78-58 Saturday. Kelsey Griffin averaged 20 points and 10 rebounds in the two games, and Nebraska only trails Oklahoma by a game. The Huskers have a chance Saturday to cement themselves in second place when they host Baylor.

4. No. 18 Texas A&M — After losing 48-45 at K-State on Jan. 6, the Aggies won five of their last six, including three wins over ranked teams: Baylor, Nebraska and Oklahoma. The strength for Texas A&M has been its defense, as the team is giving up just 48.6 points per game in its last 10 contests.

5. Texas Tech — The Lady Raiders nearly missed an exceptional week when they lost 86-81 at Oklahoma. Texas Tech rebounded to defeat then-No. 24 Texas 49-48 at home on Saturday. Alesha Robertson hit a 3-pointer with 6.1 seconds remaining to lift the Lady Raiders over their in-state rival. Texas Tech won despite shooting just 26.3 percent from the field.

6. Iowa State — Freshman Alison Lacey was named Big 12 Rookie of the Week after her performance against K-State Saturday. Lacey scored a career-high 25 points on 8-of-11 shooting in the 73-68 win over the Wildcats. The Cyclones face Nebraska tonight in Lincoln, Neb., in a game that could decide who is on top in the Big 12 North.

7. K-State — Junior Kimberly Dietz and senior Claire Coggins combined to score 46 points, but K-State still dropped a 73-68 decision at Iowa State. The Wildcats have lost three of four games without sophomore Marlies Gipson in the lineup, with the lone win coming against Kansas. Sophomore Shalee Lehning scored 17 points as K-State won its 12th straight Sunflower Showdown.

8. Oklahoma State — The Cowgirls trailed No. 11 Baylor by just three points late in the game before the Bears pulled away for a 66-55 victory. Junior Maria Cordero scored 21 points and hit 5-of-6 shots from 3-point range, but it wasn't enough to keep the Cowgirls from falling to 3-4 in Big 12 play. Oklahoma State edged Colorado 61-58 a week ago to claim its third league win.

9. Texas — The Longhorns, once a Top-25 team, fell to the bottom third of the Big 12 with a pair of losses to South Division foes. Texas dropped a 63-59 nailbiter to Baylor before falling 49-48 Saturday at Texas Tech. Senior Tiffany Jackson scored just two points in the loss to the Red Raiders. Texas lost despite holding Texas Tech to just 26 percent from the floor.

10. Missouri — The Tigers snapped a four-game losing streak with Sunday's 61-48 home victory over Colorado. Missouri shot just 31 percent from floor and had only one player reach double figures, but still managed to claim its second conference victory of the season. Once again, senior EeTisha Riddle led the way for Missouri with a team-high 12 points.

11. Colorado — The Buffaloes continue to plummet after a 2-0 start in Big 12 play. Colorado dropped a pair of road contests, 61-58 at Oklahoma State and 61-48 at Missouri, and fell to 2-5 in league play. Junior Jackie McFarland posted a team-high 19 points in Sunday's loss to the Tigers.

12. Kansas — The losses keep coming for Bonnie Hendrickson's young KU squad. The Jayhawks followed last week's 59-55 setback in Manhattan with a 20-point drubbing at Nebraska. Junior Shaquana Mosley averaged 17.5 points against the Cornhuskers and Wildcats, but it wasn't enough to lead KU to its first conference win of the season. After a 5-4 start, the Jayhawks have lost 10 of their last 11 games.

K-State players must step up after Gipson injury

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Marlies Gipson was the post presence for K-State this season. The 6-foot forward averaged 12.8 points and 8.3 rebounds per game and was the leading rebounder in eight of the Wildcats' first 16 games.

Then disaster struck.

Gipson has spent four straight games on the sideline after suffering an injury in practice Jan. 16, and the date of her return to the Wildcat starting lineup is as yet unknown.

During her absence from the floor, K-State dropped three of its last four games and was out-rebounded in every one, including the Jan. 24 win over Kansas, begging the question of whether or not the Wildcats can perform up to standard without her.

"Obviously with Marlies it's great, and things run in the flow," senior Claire Coggins said. "Without Marlies it is tough inside, but I think our posts just need to step up and realize that they have to get the job done on the boards and on offense for our team."

While playing without Gipson certainly has its disadvantages, the Wildcats demonstrated their ability to adapt to the change in valiant efforts against three of their last four Big 12 Conference opponents.

After a dismal first-half effort against Nebraska on Jan. 17, K-State charged back from a 24-point halftime deficit before falling 70-63 in Lincoln, Neb.

At the post, freshman Ashley Sweat and junior Shana Wheeler combined for 20 points, prompting the thought that K-State could still bring a competitive game in the paint.

"Well, the second half of Nebraska, and then the Baylor game, we played really well as a team," Coggins said. "We didn't let a factor of Marlies Gipson being out affect us."

There's no denying it was a factor, however, as Nebraska out-rebounded K-State 41-23 — its highest rebounding deficit since then-No. 6 Oklahoma dominated the Wildcats on the glass 57-36 on Jan. 3.

Shalee Lehning grabbed the most boards against the Huskers with seven. The sophomore guard averages 6.3 rebounds per game, the second-highest total on the team.

K-State next traveled to Baylor on Jan. 20, where despite a solid effort throughout the game, the Wildcats fell to the Bears, who out-rebounded them 42-32 in the process. Sweat gave a strong performance down low with 10 points and seven rebounds, but K-State scored just 12 points in the paint, compared to Baylor's 26.

"When you lose a significant player like Marlies, we took a lot of blows in a lot of different statistical areas," Lehning said. "And so everybody else has had to rise and take on different roles, and I'm happy to see how a lot of our teammates have."

"If anything, probably our perimeters realized we have to get more boards and we have to kind of help pick up some of the things maybe Marlies was doing."

Wheeler started three of the Wildcats' last four games, and averages 4.6 rebounds per game. Sweat, who saw an increase in playing time since Gipson's injury, is the fourth-leading scorer on the team with 9.1 points per game, and averages 4.5 rebounds.

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Marlies Gipson has missed the last four games due to a knee injury. K-State 1-3 during that stretch without its star forward.

With the exception of K-State's 59-55 escape from Big 12 rival Kansas, both Wheeler and Sweat have for the most part continued to improve their performance in the post — something they will have to continue to do in order for K-State to remain a competitor in this league, coach Deb Patterson said.

"We haven't been out-rebounding teams like Baylor, but who does?" Patterson said. "It's really more about managing the game and keeping your rebounding numbers close and grabbing big boards down the stretch.

"We're not gonna be a dominating rebounding team at this point, not having Marlies and playing as undersized as we are. But certainly we can do better."

Men's update

The ultimate sports dilemma

1. No. 6 Kansas — The Jayhawks have dominated their opponents lately, beating Colorado 97-74 in Lawrence, then traveling to Nebraska and embarrassing the Huskers 76-56. Sophomore Brandon Rush is showing signs of his first team All-America potential, averaging 19.5 points over the last two games.

2. No. 10 Texas A&M — The Aggies suffered their first Big 12 Conference loss at the hands of Texas Tech Wednesday, but rebounded to defeat Oklahoma 70-61 Saturday as Antanas Kavaliauskas scored 20 points. With star players in senior Ake Law IV and junior Joseph Jones, the Aggies could be the top contender to challenge Kansas.

3. No. 22 Texas — The Longhorns responded to a two-game losing skid with wins at Nebraska and at home against Baylor. Freshman Kevin Durant averaged 30 points the last two games. Durant, sophomore A.J. Abrams and freshman D.J. Augustin seem to improve every game.

4. No. 12 Oklahoma State — The Cowboys defeated Oklahoma 66-61 and Iowa State 62-50. Sophomore Terrel Harris scored 21 points against the Cyclones. Senior Mario Boggan and junior James On Curry continued their stellar play, combining for 56 points in the two victories.

5. K-State — K-State is on a five-game winning streak after beating Chicago State and Nebraska. The Wildcats are starting to show what Bob Huggins basketball is all about — defense. K-State held Chicago State to 36 points and Nebraska to 45 points, both season lows for each team. Junior Clint Stewart has scored in double figures in four of the last seven games.

6. Texas Tech — After a two-game winning streak in which Coach Bob Knight's squad knocked off Kansas and Texas A&M, the Red Raiders lost to Missouri by 13 points. Senior Jarius Jackson and Junior Martin Zeno continue to play well, however Texas Tech lacks scoring depth.

7. Oklahoma — The Sooners dropped two straight Big 12 games, losing at Oklahoma State 66-61 and Texas A&M 70-61. Junior Longar Longar scored in double figures in 9 of the Sooners 13 non-conference games, but has only scored in double figures in one Big 12 game with 10 points against Baylor. The Sooners need Longar to step-up and play to his potential.

8. Missouri — The Tigers started off the Big 12 season with four straight losses. Since then they have won two straight, defeating Colorado on the road 79-65 and Texas Tech at home 71-58. In the four losses the Tigers have given up an average of 79 points per game, in the two wins the Tigers have given up 61 points per game.

9. Iowa State — The Cyclones won their first two, but have lost four straight. The last two losses were to K-State 69-60 and at Oklahoma State 62-50. The Cyclones' loss to the Cowboys showed the inconsistency of the young Iowa State squad. After holding Oklahoma State to 17 points in the first half, the Cyclones gave up 45 second half points. If the Cyclones want to get back on track they must play 40 minutes of solid basketball.

10. Nebraska — Nebraska's season rapidly is falling apart. After traveling losing at K-State 61-45, the Huskers went home and were destroyed by Kansas 76-56. Junior Aleks Maric has been missing in action the last two games, combining for only 19 points.

11. Baylor — The Bears lost two more this past week, with an 82-56 home loss to Kansas and an 84-79 loss at Texas. Baylor lost its last four games by an average of 20 points. Freshman Tweety Carter scored in double digits in five of seven games before hitting a five-game skid in which his highest total is eight. He must become more of a factor in games if Baylor hopes to turn its season around.

12. Colorado — Colorado lost to Missouri at home 79-65 and at Kansas 97-74. Junior Richard Roby seems to be the only bright spot for the Buffaloes as he scored 30 in the loss to Kansas.

Missouri coach Mike Anderson is trying to turn around a basketball culture in Columbia, Mo. His Tigers are 2-4 in Big 12 Conference play.

Manhattan eventually forces everyone to become a Wildcat

Missouri coach Mike Anderson doesn't know it, but he is presenting me with quite the dilemma — one that stretches back an entire lifetime.

Two years ago after watching Missouri drop an ugly game at home, I made a promise.

"I am finished with Missouri until they get rid of Quin Snyder," I remember telling my parents.

That's right, I was a Tiger fan. As big as they come. Feel free to hate me — I understand. I bled black and gold, especially when it came to basketball.

While most of you were growing up on steady diets of Michael Bishop and Kevin Lockett, I was munching away on Anthony Peeler Cheerios and Melvin Booker Wheaties.

Mizzou basketball was a part of me. I couldn't help it. My mom graduated a Tiger and my family embraced the team — no matter how much it broke our hearts.

I can remember sitting in my parents' room watching Missouri fall to Temple in the first round of the 1993 NCAA Tournament. I'll never forget seeing the Tigers — a No. 1 seed in 1994 — get handled by Arizona in the Elite Eight to miss a shot at the Final Four.

Neither of those were the worst, however. I had nightmares for years after UCLA's Tyus Edney drove the length of the court in four seconds to beat Mizzou on a last-second layup, catapulting the Bruins to the 1995 NCAA title.

I still cringe when CBS shows that "highlight" every March. So, as a K-State freshman three years ago, I refused to believe there was any way I could ever embrace the Wildcats. I fought hard. Yes, I was that annoying guy in the student section who wore the gold T-shirt when the Tigers came to Bramlage Coliseum, the guy who cheered against the Wildcats if it somehow could improve Missouri's standing in the Big 12 Conference.

On and on it went — for my first two years, in fact. But then something happened. Or I should say, someone happened — someone by the name of Quin Snyder.

Snyder — the former Tiger basketball coach fired at the end of last season — did something I never thought possible. In his short, embarrassing stint at Missouri, Snyder took all the hope I had for Mizzou sports and crushed it. He made me never want to root for the Tigers again. And then came the promise.

Call me a fair-weather fan — I can't blame you. But I think something else played a role in that decision, something I never saw coming.

Around that time, I started looking around Manhattan, and I realized it isn't such a bad place after all. Sure, it is out in the country and everybody in town wears too much purple and the highest speed limit is 40 miles per hour, but it didn't matter.

What mattered was that everyone cared. It didn't matter that the sports teams brought more disappointment than hope. Wildcat fans lived for those moments when they all could join together and celebrate.

And before I knew it, I was in on the action. I was decked out in purple doing the Wabash Cannonball in the crowd. I was talking K-State sports with everyone who wanted to listen. I became a Wildcat in a blur, and I loved every minute of it.

You see, there's just something about this place. It might take awhile, but eventually it grasps you and you can't fight it any longer.

All of that brings me to today, when my once-beloved Tigers, now coached by Anderson, come to Bramlage. Anderson is everything I ever wanted in a coach and is the exact person Missouri needed to pull it out of basketball obscurity.

He coaches with passion, and his players respond. He gives his all, pours his heart into the game and expects his team to do the same.

In many ways, Anderson is attempting the same feat as coach Bob Huggins — trying to turn around a basketball culture, which is not exactly an easy task.

So far, it seems to be working. The Tigers are by no means incredible, but they play with guts, something lacking during the Snyder era. Anderson is giving hope to the Mizzou faithful, and they are starting to respond.

And I am in a pickle, because my promise has overrun its time limit. It's time for a decision. The most destructive coach in Tiger history is gone.

As much as I'd love to return to my roots, I'm sorry, Mike Anderson. I have all the respect in the world for you and what you are trying to do, but once I went purple, there was no turning back.

There's something about this place, and I don't intend to let go of it. Ever.

Empty-ville?

Inconsistent fans post record attendance at Bramlage Coliseum after Huggins' plea to fill seats

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After K-State's 61-45 win over Nebraska Saturday night at Bramlage Coliseum, coach Bob Huggins instructed his team to walk over to the student section.

One by one, each Wildcat player showed gratitude and appreciation for all the fans who came out to support them.

Junior David Hoskins walked over to the first row and gave out two-handed high fives. Junior Blake Young was all smiles, standing in front of an adoring crowd. Freshman Jason Bennett was the recipient of thunderous cheers.

It seemed like a perfect match. A winning basketball team and a fan base that's eager to get to the NCAA Tournament for the first time in more than a decade.

From start to finish, a near-capacity crowd of 12,086 cheered K-State to victory. It was the Wildcats' fifth straight win, which put them near the top of the Big 12 Conference standings.

With a crowd like this, Bramlage has the potential to be among the toughest venues for a road team to steal a win.

There's just one problem: fans haven't been filling the seats, purchased tickets have been going unused, and - up until the Nebraska game - Huggins was mad at the fans and publicly voiced his displeasure.

On Oct. 13, Bramlage opened its doors to the public for K-State's first practice of the season. The event was dubbed "Madness in Manhattan," and nearly 10,000 fans showed up to see Huggins and the new-look Wildcats.

Hundreds of K-State fans rushed toward the lower levels of Bramlage the minute the doors opened. Within a half hour the place was packed.

A large group of students wore purple and white body paint that spelled out, "Welcome To Huggieville."

Huggins took the microphone and addressed the crowd, which cheered his every word.

"I was amazed at the people running in here to get seats," Huggins said. "We're going to care as much as you do, and we're going to win."

Then he made a request that many K-State fans seemingly haven't taken to heart. "Don't stop," Huggins said. "Please don't stop, because we're not going to."

The attendance figures don't necessarily suggest K-State fans have stopped, but it does indicate that they've slowed down. Through 10 home games the Wildcats have averaged just more than 9,000 fans, which means thousands of sold tickets are going unused. Bramlage's capacity is 13,340.

That has Garth Gardiner, a 1989 K-State graduate and season-ticket holder, disappointed in his fellow fans.

"I understand conflicts and not being able to come to the games, but there's no reason if you have a ticket to the game and you can't come, that you can't find somebody who can use it," Gardiner said. "It's so important to the future of this program to have it full every night. I don't think our fan base quite understands the magnitude of Bob Huggins being our coach."

Or, as Gardiner points out, the potential risks involved if the seats aren't getting filled.

♦♦♦♦

Gardiner makes his residence in Ashland, Kan., and drives 280 miles to attend almost every K-State home game. He sits courtside with his family and is noticeably vocal and animated during games. Whether he is shouting encouragements to the Wildcats or helping them up off the floor (he reached out a hand to lift senior Jermaine Maybank off the hardwood during the Nebraska game), Gardiner said he is getting his money's worth.

But as he looks around Bramlage, he said he's left to wonder if the same can be said for others.

"There's people that are acting like they are watching a chess match, granted they probably look at me and think I'm an idiot," Gardiner said. "I think it's about having a good time and creating a homecourt advantage, and you don't do that by sitting with your arms and legs crossed all game."

Gardiner also said you don't build an atmosphere by sitting at home, and that's what has him concerned. He wants fans in the seats wants to restore some of the magic that was lost when the team moved from Ahearn Field House to Bramlage in 1988.

"If we don't fill this place

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

K-State fans taunt opposing players during pre-game introductions. Attendance has been inconsistent during the season but fans showed up for the Jan. 27 game against Nebraska. The game was only the second sell-out of the season and also had the largest crowd of the year.

up every time they come out, then somebody else will come in and hire (Huggins) from us. That's just the honest truth," said Gardiner, who has developed a relationship with Huggins and his coaching staff since they arrived last March. "If we fill it up and we create an intimidating homecourt advantage, I think he'll retire here."

"Hugs doesn't want to do things half-assed. If you can't fill a 13,500 seat facility, he'll go somewhere where they will."

♦♦♦♦

One of the big mysteries in regard to fan attendance this year is the lack of student support. According to Robin Fosha, director of ticket operations, all student tickets were sold prior to the start of the season.

If that's the case, then why aren't the seats being filled?

Chris Lovett, a 1989 K-State graduate, believes students expected too much, too soon when Huggins arrived. He also thinks some of the Wildcats' early losses took some of the steam out of the fan base.

"I think some of the losses, particularly the blowouts against New Mexico and California, sort of dampened the expectations," Lovett said. "Then came the Colorado State game (an 84-83 loss), where Martin missed two of three foul shots ... that was a tough one."

Three days after the Colorado State loss, the Wildcats were back at home to play Cleveland State. The building was nearly half-empty, as just 7,255 fans - the lowest attendance of the season - showed up to watch K-State's 93-60 win.

Jeremy Klose, a K-State sophomore, said the lack of "name" opponents has kept him from attending games. He said he has yet to show up to a single game despite having season-tickets.

"I just can't get excited for games against William & Mary or Tennessee Tech," said Klose, staring at a strip of unused tickets. "I enjoy watching basketball, but I'd rather watch a game that I know will be a good one."

Klose said he plans on going to some of the upcoming games, and said he would try to give his tickets away if he can't attend because of his schedule.

"I feel sort of guilty knowing that my tickets have gone to waste," Klose said. "I'm going to make sure if I can't go, that my ticket gets used by somebody. I don't want Huggins blaming me for empty seats."

♦♦♦♦

Some Big 12 schools, such as Missouri and Texas A&M, have their student sections behind the basket rather than along the sidelines. K-State students sit opposite the team benches, in an area that extends nearly the full length of the court.

Still, Fosha said seating at Bramlage isn't set in stone for future seasons, and that the ticket office can make adjustments on a season-by-season basis.

"With our new entry scanning system, we can tell exactly how many students are attending each game," Fosha said. "With that information, student ticket numbers and seating locations can be reviewed and adjusted if necessary in the next few years."

As many as approximately 2,500 student seats have been unfilled for K-State home games this season. Fo-sha said it's a concern, but understands the reasons fans have for missing games.

"It's not only the students that have not been fully utilizing their tickets, our public attendance has been less than purchased as well," Fosha said. "We realize that ticket holders have other commitments, but we encourage people to sell or give away their tickets to games they cannot attend."

Blake Young encourages it as well. He said he wants to play in front of a packed building each time his team takes the floor.

"We need a crowd like that every night," Young said after the Nebraska game. "Every night we step out there at Bramlage we need a crowd like that."

Road trip: Austin, Texas

Check out the best things to do, see and eat in Austin when K-State plays Texas

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Texas' capital city will be host to the K-State men this Saturday. If the game itself isn't reason enough to go, consider the balmy Gulf weather and the big-city offerings of the Longhorns' home town.

The drive to Austin is nearly 11 hours and 700 miles from Manhattan, but Austin, the southernmost of the Big 12 Conference cities, has a lot to offer its prospective visitors. These are just a few of the attractions considered to be the best by travel guides and Web sites.

Nightlife

The bar scene in every college town is similar, yet each has a personality of its own. Austin, the biggest of the Big 12 cities, has plenty of after-hours activity to keep visitors busy and claims the title of "Live Music Capital of the World," according to the Convention and Visitors Bureau Web site.

■ Cain & Abel's

2313 Rio Grande St.
At more than a decade old, this spot near the UT campus has been likened to Animal House and is a great place to be before, during or after the game. Featuring live music, a grill and an outdoor patio, Cain & Abel's is a favorite place for Longhorn students. After all, the town was named the United States' best city for singles by Forbes magazine.

■ Speakeasy

412 D Congress Ave.
This downtown dive lives up to its suggestive name. Located in the trendy Warehouse District, it's a great place to find jazz. The dim lighting and plush decor match the music. Patrons enjoy lounging on the antique velvet couches with a martini in hand.

■ Draught Horse Pub & Brewery

4112 Medical Parkway
Beer lovers should make this brewery, featuring more than 50 brews on tap, a must-see. The pub has some of its own concoctions, but people also can enjoy the dartboards, jukebox and a blood-alcohol measuring machine.

Restaurants

Austin is in beef country, and these carnivore-conscious places come highly recommended. Work up an appetite cheering on the Wildcats, then stop by one of these restaurants for a Texas-sized meal.

■ Threadgill's

301 W. Riverside Drive
6216 N. Lamar
The first location of this restaurant opened as a gas station in the '30s, when the restaurant's namesake sold moonshine out back. Today, the booze isn't homemade, but it hasn't lost its low-brow feel. Threadgill's sells homestyle food like fried chicken and meatloaf for under $8. However, the food isn't the only attraction. The Riverside location also is well-known for local music, and the walls are covered with playbills and other memorabilia.

■ Fonda San Miguel

2330 W. Northloop
Those looking for Tex-Mex should stop at this 30-year-old establishment first. Though enchiladas and other entrees run around $15, people say the food — especially the queso — is worth the price. Patrons enjoy the southwest decor complete with adobe, colorful tiles and native plants. Grab a cold margarita, and if you're on a budget, aim for the appetizers over the entrees.

■ County Line

3345 Bee Cave Road #150
County Line is the place for people with big appetites. It has served giant portions of BBQ, prime rib and an assortment of other meats since 1975. For just under $20, diners can enjoy all-you-can-eat platters along with a cold beer. The bread is fresh daily, and most people leave too full to take advantage of the dessert menu. The restaurant also offers a spacious outdoor deck with a nice view, as it sits atop a hill. A second location, at 5204 FM 2222, sits on a lake and has equally satisfying fare.

Attractions

Every big road trip deserves its share of sight-seeing, and Austin has quite a few sights. For just $5.50, travelers can visit the recently established Bob Bullock Texas State History Museum, 1800 North Congress Ave., which includes American Indian artifacts, letters by Sam Houston and an IMAX theater. The museum is just four blocks from the impressive capitol.

Outdoorsy folk might enjoy scenic Zilker Park, the city's largest public park, which has miles of trails and waterways.

Across the way is Zilker Botanical Gardens, which has 26 acres of beautiful vegetation. The south end of the park houses Umlauf Sculpture Garden and Museum, more than 130 pieces in a variety of subjects and media.

Austin also has tons of shopping options. If you come in a pickup truck, the Antique Market-place, 5350 Burnet Road, is a good place to bring home a load of vintage goods. With 50-plus dealers, shoppers are bound to find something that fits their tastes.

Barnes and Noble fans will like the independent mega-store Book People, 603 N. Lamar Boulevard, a two-story, 27,000-square-foot behemoth. The store stocks mainstream favorites as well as lesser-known titles. Enjoy a new read while sipping espresso in its full-service café.

For those who prefer more common fare, the Kerby Lane/Jefferson Square area, 38th St. from N. Lamar Boulevard to Mopac, has many merchants selling everything from kids' toys to couture.

Erwin Center

The Frank Erwin Center has served as home to the Texas Men's and Women's Basketball teams since the 1977-78 season. With the completion of 28 luxury suites at the top of the arena section, the capacity for the Erwin Center has increased to 16,755 — the largest in the Big 12.

The arena also features a new Jumbotron scoreboard and an LCD screen that loops around the top of the arena section. The school remodeled and moved the concession and restroom areas to widen the concourses.

The building is named for former University of Texas Board of Regents member Frank Erwin, who was instrumental in the expansion of the university during his term.

Men's 5 Keys to Victory

Efficient offense, contributions from Maybank key this week for Wildcats

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

1. BANK ON MAYBANK

Reserve guard Jermaine Maybank played 18 minutes and scored seven points in K-State's win over Nebraska, arguably his best outing of the season. Afterwards, coach Bob Huggins said he's trying to get Maybank to "do what he can do" — in other words, take care of the ball and hit shots when he's open. If Maybank can do those things on a consistent basis, he'll add some quality depth to K-State's backcourt.

2. PROTECT THE BALL

The Wildcats committed a season-high 24 turnovers the last time they tangled with Missouri and still managed to escape Columbia, Mo., with a victory. However, K-State might not be so lucky next time. Twenty turnovers could spell disaster against Missouri and Texas.

3. SCORE BIG

The Wildcats are 11-1 this season when they shoot better than their opponent. Missouri and Texas are two of the better shooting teams in the Big 12 Conference, so K-State will need to bring its A game on offense. Thirty percent from the field won't cut it this week.

4. CONTINUE PROGRESS

Freshmen Jason Bennett and Luis Colon shut down Nebraska's Aleks Maric Saturday, holding him to 10 points on 4-of-12 shooting. However, Texas' Kevin Durant and Missouri's Marshall Brown present a different kind of challenge for the K-State defense.

Brown and Durant are big enough to dominate the paint and athletic enough to play on the perimeter, so K-State's smaller forwards (senior Cartier Martin and junior David Hoskins) might draw the tough defensive assignment of guarding these two go-to guys.

5. KEEP UP INTENSITY

Two weeks ago, K-State was 0-2 in league play and hungry for its first Big 12 victory. Since then, the Wildcats have rattled off four straight wins and climbed into the top half of the conference standings. However, K-State can't afford to get complacent. As Huggins said, tonight's contest against Missouri is the first game of a 10-game season that will make or break K-State's NCAA Tournament hopes.

Senior Jermaine Maybank scored seven points in K-State's 61-45 victory over Nebraska Jan. 27. His play will be important this week.

Junior Steffon Hannah originally signed a letter of intent to come play for K-State and coach Bob Huggins. His mom never signed the papers, and instead influenced his decision to go to Missouri.

Missouri guard faces Wildcats for first time in Bramlage Coliseum after recruiting battle

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bob Huggins recruited Steffon Hannah when he was at Chipola College in Marianna, Fla., and even offered him an athletic scholarship.

It looked like Hannah wanted to come to K-State as well. He signed his letter of intent with K-State, but there was a problem — Hannah's mother, Stephanie, didn't sign.

Instead, she signed a letter for Hannah to go to Missouri.

The junior ended up at Missouri after receiving offers from Houston, Fresno State, Illinois State and Texas-El Paso, in addition to K-State.

He is the Tigers' starting point guard this season and is averaging 15.3 points, 4.7 assists and 3.2 rebounds per game. In Big 12 Conference play, he averages 13.8 points, 4 assists and 2.1 rebounds per game.

As a team, Missouri started conference play 0-2 after giving up a 16-point lead to Iowa State and suffering a loss at Texas.

The Tigers continued losing when K-State came to Columbia, Mo., and held Hannah to seven points.

They played their next game against Kansas and lost by three. Even in the losing effort, Hannah had a strong performance, scoring 15 points.

Still, his team was 0-4 in the Big 12. They found a cure, however, in Colorado. Mizzou beat the Buffaloes by 14 and went on to defeat Texas Tech by 13 Saturday.

Hannah's team stands at 2-4 in conference, and once again is facing the team of which he could have been a part.

"We started off slow, but we are going to be picking it up," Hannah said.

Missouri had its first sell-out of the season Saturday when Hannah demonstrated why both Tiger coach Mike Anderson and Huggins wanted him. He scored 15 while dishing out four assists and grabbing five rebounds. He seems comfortable where he is.

"It has really been great so far," Hannah said about playing at Missouri. "The fans, players and coaches here have all been really supportive."

This Wednesday he returns to a place that could have supported him while he wore purple. Instead, they will heckle him while he wears the black and gold.

However, he doesn't seem intimidated.

"Nah, not really," Hannah said when asked if this game against Wildcats was of any extra importance to him. "I have played on the road before. I just need to do what I can to help my team."

Women's 5 Keys to Victory

Limiting mistakes, controlling paint to be crucial for Wildcats this week

By Dayne Logan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

1. BANG THE BOARDS

Since Marlies Gipson sustained a leg injury two weeks ago, the Wildcats' opponents have out-rebounded them by an average of 15 per game. This lack of rebounding has been the main cause of K-State's recent poor performances and until it is fixed, the team will continue to struggle.

2. MAUL MCFARLAND

Jackie McFarland, sister of former K-State center Jessica McFarland, is a one-woman show for Colorado. The junior forward is averaging a double-double on the season with 18.7 points and 10.7 rebounds per game. If the Wildcats' inside struggles continue, McFarland could have a field day.

3. JAM JACKSON

Texas senior Tiffany Jackson could cause trouble for the Wildcats this week. Much like McFarland, Jackson is a tremendous inside presence, averaging 17.8 points and 8.9 rebounds per game. If the Wildcats struggle against Colorado on Wednesday, expect a similar result against Texas over the weekend.

4. PLAY TOGETHER

Sophomore Shalee Lehning and junior Kimberly Dietz both had career-highs in the last two weeks with 20 points and 25 points, respectively. With individual performances such as these, it's hard to believe K-State lost three of its last four games.

If the Wildcats stand any chance of ending the skid, the team needs to figure out how to put it all together on the same night.

5. MINIMIZE MISTAKES

Despite losing at Iowa State, the Wildcats played a smart game and kept turnovers to a minimum with eight. If K-State can keep its turnovers below double-digits, the games will stay close and the wins will start to come.

Governor's plan includes increase in turnpike fees

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius announced her multi-year proposal Wednesday to address $665 million in deferred maintenance at Kansas Board of Regents universities.

Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance, said it is not known how much funding K-State will receive for its more than $254 million in deferred maintenance. While an exact formula has yet to be determined, Rawson said Regents' officials have discussed allocating funds based on buildings' age and use.

"The governor's proposal is really an excellent first step in the problem," he said. "We have a long way to go in finally resolving these issues, but I think we've off to an excellent start."

The following four elements outline Sebelius' Foundations for the Future proposal, according to a release from Sebelius' Web site:

■ Free up to $15 million each year from the Crumbling Classrooms initiative.

Sebelius' proposal would free $15 million each year from the Crumbling Classrooms initiative, which was authorized by state legislators in 1996. The governor's plan frees up these funds by using $75 million in un-anticipated state revenue to pay off bonds currently being debt-serviced by the State General Fund. Also, this would allow $30 million generated each year to become available to the Educational Building Fund for ongoing maintenance.

■ Provide $300 million to Regents throughout six years.

Regents' universities would receive $50 million each year for six years to address critical deferred maintenance needs. Sebelius' plan proposes legislation that would require the Kansas Turnpike Authority to implement a surcharge. It would be implemented throughout a seven-year period and would not exceed 7 percent.

■ Provide access to $200 million in low-interest loans to Regents' universities.

Proposed legislation would authorize the Pooled Money Investment Board to provide up to $200 million in loans to fund a revolving loan program.

■ Mandate that all future buildings constructed with donations or other funds not legislature-appropriate be maintained by the Regents.

This plan prevents future deferred-maintenance backlogs by requiring Regents universities to take the cost of maintenance into account when constructing buildings.

Deferred maintenance is putting off upkeep for a future time, according to the Regents Web site. Deferred maintenance is separated into two cost categories — building renewal costs and utility/infrastructure costs. K-State leads the six Regents universities in deferred maintenance.

Sebelius' proposal must pass through the Kansas House of Representatives and Senate before she signs or vetoes it.

"This plan is responsible and focused, and it allows us to enhance the academic mission of our universities now and in the future," Sebelius said in a press release. "I look forward to

Manhattan resident reports rape

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan woman reported an incidence of rape to the Riley County Police Department on Tuesday night, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the RCPD said.

The rape was reported by a 25-year-old female at 6:20 p.m. Tuesday and allegedly occurred in the northeast part of Manhattan, Quintanar said.

The woman reported the assailant was not known to her, he said.

"She was allegedly approached by a male at her residence," Quintanar said.

This appears to be an isolated incident, and police are looking into the allegation of rape, Quintanar said.

Quintanar said the incident is not related to the series of rapes that have been reported in Manhattan in past years.

Man stabbed by ricocheting knife

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan man was the victim of an apparent self-stabbing early Tuesday morning, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department said.

Matthew J. Robke, 4440 Tuttle Creek Blvd., No. 19, was taken to Mercy Health Center, and the RCPD was notified by the hospital that a person had been stabbed, Quintanar said.

When officers arrived, Robke was intoxicated and indicated that no foul play was involved, Quintanar said.

Robke was stabbed in the stomach, he said.

"He was playing around with a knife, and it bounced off a wall and stabbed him," Quintanar said.

The RCPD is investigating, he said.

Minimum wage increase may affect student workers

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The bill that proposes an increase of $2.10 an hour to the federal minimum wage has some businesses wondering how their budgets will be affected by the additional cost — including K-State.

Campus minimum wage is $6 an hour at K-State — that is 85 cents more than the federal minimum wage. According to data from the Department of Human Resources, the average K-State student employee is making about $7.26-$7.38 an hour — as much as 13 cents more than the proposed wage increase.

University administrators have

Police charge 3 in chimichanga, Hot Pocket theft

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An employee of the Short Stop store, 2010 Tuttle Creek Blvd., reported stolen seven varieties of Hot Pockets, four types of Deli Express sandwiches and one El Monterey chimichanga, and the discovery of the food items allowed the Riley County Police Department to make two arrests on outstanding warrants, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the RCPD said.

Two Manhattan residents and a Wichita man were cited for the thefts of the items, Quintanar said.

Adrian Reese, Ericka Forster and Tylan Hite were stopped and questioned as a routine police matter as they were walking in the Blue Hills area of Manhattan, Quintanar said, and Hite provided false information to the RCPD as to his identity, which led to his being charged with obstruction of the legal process.

The police had arrest warrants for Hite and Reese.

The officer searched Hite and found numerous food items on him, as well as some cocaine, Quintanar said.

Hite said the food was purchased from Short Stop, and the officer gave the food to Reese and Forster, then arrested Hite.

Police charged Hite with obstruction of the legal process, possession of cocaine, probation violation and two charges of failure to appear. Bond was set at $2,750.

The officer discovered the food was stolen and returned to Forster's residence at 1366 Flint Hills Place, where Reese was arrested and Forster was cited.

Police charged Reese with probation violation. Bond was denied.

Winter weather causes massive pileup on I-35

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Slick roads caused a pileup that involved more than 35 vehicles on Interstate 35 in Johnson County, Kan., Wednesday afternoon. No fatalities have been reported.

Ten people were injured when a tractor-trailer went out of control and jackknifed at about noon and other cars slid into it, a witness told the Overland Park, Kan., Police Department. Twelve blocks of northbound lanes of I-35 were closed, the Capitol-Journal reported.

At least six ambulances responded to the wreck. The most seriously injured was a pregnant woman in her mid-20s, the Kansas City Star reported.

The pileup was not the only wreck caused by icy roads in Kansas.

A Salina woman was injured when the vehicle in which she was riding slid on an icy road into a bridge rail near McPherson, Kan., at 11:42 a.m., according to the Kansas Highway Patrol Web site.

Safety tips

The highway patrol said those who choose to drive on icy roads should take the extra precautions.

- Allow extra time for delays and slower traffic speeds.
- Buckle up and properly secure children in safety seats.
- Increase the distance between the vehicle ahead.
- Accelerate and break gently.
- Make turns slowly.
- Be sure to see have clear windows and mirrors.
- Steer into the swerve if the vehicle slides. Anticipate a second skid in the opposite direction as the car straightens out.
- Do not drink alcohol.
- Watch for deer.

1. Which pop star will sing the national anthem at the Super Bowl this Sunday?

- A. John Cougar Mellencamp
B. Bruce Springsteen
C. Billy Joel
D. William Hung

2. The finale of this prime-time teen drama will air Feb. 22. Its network is cutting the season short — and the series, too — due to sinking ratings.

- A. The OC
B. Gilmore Girls
C. One Tree Hill
D. Saved by the Bell

3. On Monday night, Lauren Nelson became Miss America 2007. What state did Nelson represent?

- A. Texas
B. Oklahoma
C. California
D. Tennessee

4. This woman received the Lifetime Achievement Award during the 13th Screen Actors Guild Awards Sunday.

- A. Meryl Streep
B. Diane Keaton
C. Julie Andrews
D. Paris Hilton

5. Nicolas Cage will portray a superhero in this movie to be released Feb. 16.

- A. Captain America
B. Captain Planet
C. Ghost Rider
D. Uh, he named his son Kal-El. He should be banned from anything superhero-related.

5 correct: You probably know more about Britney Spears than she does. (But then again, you probably know more about just about everything than Britney Spears does.) Lay off the entertainment magazines, and try reading something more meaningful, like your textbooks.

2-4 correct: You know what's going on, but you can survive an evening apart from your TV. Congratulations on achieving that fine balance between celeb obsession and living in a black hole.

0-1 correct: Your knowledge of the entertainment world is attained mostly through osmosis. And since osmosis really isn't an effective way to learn anything, your entertainment I.Q. is severely lacking. Hopefully you employ more effective methods of learning your class material.

Black History Month events to begin with rose sale

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students have planned a slew of events and activities for Black History Month, which begins today.

Letitia Tajuba, senior in history and political science, coordinates Black History Month events for Black Student Union. Tajuba said the month's events are designed to educate people on campus.

"I guess a goal of ours is to have events that will invite people to come and know that they're always welcome to come to the Black Student Union," she said.

Tajuba said the events are directed at all students on campus because of the diversity of people who are included in black history.

"Within black history, or any history, there are a lot of people coming together for one cause," she said. "Every race and culture has a hand in black history."

Akilah Mahon, senior in finance, said a candy rose sale will be Feb. 5.

Tajuba said several big events are planned for the month, including an "Ask a Black Woman" panel Feb. 27 and an "Ask a Black Man" panel Feb. 28.

The panels will include black faculty, staff and students from noon to 1 p.m. in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

Tajuba said BSU's will meet at 7 p.m., Feb. 6 in Union 212. The organization encourages students to attend to hear more about what is planned for the month and the semester.

The organization will be host to many speakers on campus including Chuck D, co-founder of the rap group Public Enemy, and Herman Boone, the high school football coach portrayed in the movie "Remember the Titans."

Other events for the month include the Soul Cafe where Omega Psi Phi is helping sponsor an event that will allow students to show their talents on Open Mic Night.

'Abortion Diaries' gives opportunity to participate in discussion

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When she went in for an abortion, in the days before Roe v. Wade, the doctor closed the windows and locked the door. He used no painkillers or medical instruments - just a suction bulb. Now, she is unable to have children.

That was one woman's story in the movie "The Abortion Diaries," shown Wednesday night at Manhattan Public Library. The documentary tells the stories of 12 women and their abortion experiences.

About 70 K-State students, faculty and community members attended to learn more about abortion, receive extra credit for their women's studies classes or share ideas.

The film followed how the women became pregnant, how they made the decision to abort, and finally, the relief they felt when it was over.

The opening scene to "The Abortion Diaries" showed a stick figure of a girl clutching her knees, with a thought bubble that read, "If it's so common, why do I feel so alone?"

According to the film, 34 percent of females become pregnant in their teens, one-third of women have abortions, and 1.3 million women will have an abortion this year.

The documentary also said making the decision to abort is not just one decision; there are many decisions.

When the film finished, Betty Banner, director of the Manhattan National Organization for Women chapter, said women should learn more about the issue to "ensure we continue to have rights as women." The focus then switched to the audience's reaction to the film.

Banner explained the discussion was to be a dialogue in which individuals expand their perspectives by listening to and understanding what others had to say, not to convince others their ideas were right or wrong.

What potentially could have been a heated argument was a civil, educational and understanding discussion.

NOW member Debbie Nuss and Angela Hubler, director of the women's studies program, organized the screening.

At first there was silence when Hubler opened the room to discussion. Once the discussion began, however, it soared on for nearly an hour.

Students and community members shared their reactions, stories, and concerns surrounding the issue of abortion.

Phoebe Samelson, representative for the Peggy Bowman Second Chance fund, also participated in the discussion. She said she believes a woman should have the right to choose. She said women need education to prevent unplanned pregnancies.

Samelson said women should know the emergency contraceptive, Plan B, is now available over the counter for women 18 and older.

"It is up to the pharmacist whether or not they wish to dispense Plan B," she said.

After the discussion, some audience members still couldn't see how a woman could consciously make the decision to have an abortion.

Jacob Newell, freshman in pre-psychology, shared his mother's story.

Lyndsey Born | COLLEGIAN

Audience members watch "The Abortion Diaries" Wednesday evening at the Manhattan Public Library. A discussion on abortion followed the film.

Newell's mother first became pregnant at age 15, again at 18, and finally with him at 25.

"I couldn't imagine life without my siblings," he said.

When the discussion came to a close, Nuss said she was impressed with the turnout and pleased to see people comfortably speaking about the issue.

"This takes a lot of courage," she said.

Jasmine Smith, freshman in open option, expressed her understanding for both sides.

She said she realized that when women get pregnant, they think of both options no matter what they believe.

Smith said she thinks it should be up to women to make choices that are best for their lives, and they should not be pressured by anyone.

Smith is five months pregnant.

Macy Wendler, junior in apparel and textiles, said seeing abortion from the viewpoint of women rather than just political propaganda was a nice change.

"I thought it was refreshing," she said.

TO THE POINT Sebelius' plan skirts around tax increase

The governor's plan to fund our long-deferred maintenance issues using Turnpike Authority revenues is a paltry solution to a growing problem.

We understand Kansas is not home to vast quantities of cash waiting to be doled out.

But reliance upon the Turnpike Authority places too much emphasis on an elastic supply of money milked from a minimal part of the state.

The role of the Turnpike tools is, and should be, to finance the perpetual maintenance necessary to keep Kansas roads in good repair.

Most of us have seen the rocky crags of I-70 at the Colorado border, or worse, the hillbilly-flanked mud tracks Missouri passes off as highways.

We joyfully endure tolls if it keeps us from such a fate, and rather than manufacturing new roles for the Turnpike out of thin air, we are content to leave it be.

Kansas universities are the responsibility of the entire state.

It may be more politically viable to sneak an extra "driving tax" rather than raise taxes as a whole or reduce state funding to other programs, but it hardly is an equitable solution.

The state is staring three-quarters of a billion dollars in the eye on deferred maintenance alone. Yes, we need a solution to our crumbling campuses.

However, lawmakers need to look at reliable sources of funding instead of keeping government programs at their current level under the guise of a tax-friendly bill.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Forever young

College students in prime of their lives, have no concept of old age

I am getting old. This phrase assaults my ears at least once a week, and I can't help but laugh to myself when it does.

I do not hear it from people in their 30s, 40s or 50s. No, I hear these words from my own peers.

Although my back bothers me constantly, and I am ready for a nap come 11 a.m., I look in the mirror every morning, and I see the exact same face that stared back at me when I was 14.

I see no smile lines; my hair is its natural color, and the skin under my chin is firm and smooth. My fellow collegiate young-uns, this is not "old age."

We're in the prime of our lives. It is still socially acceptable for us to walk out in public in flip flops and ball caps without incurring snide comments.

We have energy, stamina and hyperactivity flowing through our blood streams. Midnight is a typical bedtime.

Granted, it's a bit strange to turn on the radio in my rusted-out '88 Oldsmobile Delta 88 and hear one of my favorite fifth-grade songs, circa 1996, on the retro lunch-hour show.

However, I will not allow the classification of 1990s alternative-rock as "retro" to define me as old.

Now, allow me to counter my previous statement with this: there is nothing wrong with "getting old." When the day comes when I am "old" — and who knows what age really determines this — I plan to embrace the title with a smile and a "thank you."

Because, boys and girls, old age is something that is earned, not given. We cannot say we have lived by age 20-ish, because we haven't.

The word "old" has developed many negative connotations in an ageist society.

People don't get old; cheese and milk get old. Instead, I suggest that we start using different phrases, such as "golden years" or "second childhood."

When I turn 25, 30 and even 40, I plan to embrace these milestones with open arms.

Age is a state of mind. If you are 21 or 22 years old and you think you are old, then you are. Combating ageism starts today in the prime of our youth.

In the November 2006 newsletter from the K-State Center on Aging, Debra Sellers, assistant professor of family studies and human services, encouraged current gerontology students to "think of aging as a personal journey."

As a 21-year-old student, I encourage all academic majors to look at life from Sellers' perspective.

Embrace each day of your 20s with the mindset of learning from those "more golden" than we are. They've been there, and we are just getting started.

We know so little after two decades. Some of us consider wisdom as partying four days a week and racking up obscene amounts of credit-card debt. No day is promised.

Above all else, consider "getting old" a blessing. It is just that simple.

Architecture, landscape of campus lend appeal

As scandalous as it is to admit, I have quite a few friends at the University of Kansas, and I have a deep respect for their general views and opinions regarding almost any topic aside from football.

This is why I was startled some time ago when a close Jayhawk friend of mine expressed his general distaste for our K-State campus, dismissing our grounds as flat and unexciting.

"No way," I protested, genuinely confused. "It's a gorgeous campus. I especially love the buildings that look like castles — don't you think those at least are great?"

Since the beginning of this semester, I have been trying to see what this friend of mine could have meant. I stroll around campus with my faithful noise-drowning iPod playing, scan my eyes over our sweet little setup, and I try to picture what he saw during his visit. As hard as I try, I can't seem to see the same campus.

I remember the last time I was in Lawrence and got a view of the KU campus. It is beautiful in its own right, with thought-provoking statues and looming glossy buildings.

It is so big and open. But standing here at K-State, I can't imagine having chosen anywhere else to attend college, even though KU once was a very tempting option for me. This is my home.

All year, I do my student duty and venture across the grounds from class to class. It's my favorite part of the day. I can zone out with my thoughts and enjoy the remarkable scenery as I go.

I am completely smitten with the castle-like buildings. I love how the flowers come up purple. I enjoy hiding out in the "secret" garden in Seaton Hall and lying under the trees in the quad.

I think Hale Library is stunning. I love the glossy mirror windows of Rathbone Hall and the hip lowercase purple letters that mark the K-State Student Union. I especially love how all of this comes together in a clustered campus, giving the feeling of one unified area rather than the scattered and lost feeling I sometimes get when traipsing around Lawrence.

I feel closed-in and snug. K-State is a big school with a small-school feel to it.

In the spring and summer, the campus is at its finest. It hums in greens and blues, and there is a crisp contrast with the off-whites and browns of the buildings. In the fall, everything grows more dignified as the smattering of colors hits the ground and piles of leaves stack up everywhere, just begging my more ridiculous friends to dive in.

In the winter, the buildings are the primary features that keep my attention, as I desperately try to pretend that it hasn't gone and snowed again. To battle any dullness I might begin to feel during this time of the year, I keep pictures of the campus in summer plastered on the walls of my bedroom to remind me of how gorgeous everything can and will be again.

In the end, I think the Jayhawks have an unbelievable campus, and it immediately is obvious that much time and thought has gone into making their school an attractive and creative place for their students.

But given the choice, I prefer my home on the K-State campus, where the naturally beautiful and the man-made shine together, and I am always excited to see it.

Ethiopian farmers deserve more profit, American consumers don't care

Staff Editorial
MINNESOTA DAILY (U. MINNESOTA)

MINNEAPOLIS — You might want to think twice about buying your next latte from Starbucks.

Or at least the international agency Oxfam believes you should. The organization is on a mission to strong-arm the world's largest coffee retailer into giving Ethiopian coffee farmers a better deal. The campaign offers an important lesson on why these movements work and — at the same time — why they don't.

According to Oxfam, the Ethiopian government tried to get Starbucks to sign an agreement that would allow Ethiopians to retain ownership of their coffee names.

Even though it sounds trivial, the distinct names of Ethiopian coffee — Sidamo, Harar and Yirgacheffe, for instance — offer a distinct advantage in the marketplace. According to Oxfam's statistics, this move could generate an additional $92 million in profit for Ethiopia.

Of course, the agreement would cost Starbucks money. Ninety-two million dollars doesn't appear out of thin air. Starbucks would pay more for Ethiopian coffee, because the names give the coffee an added value.

The question comes down to where the money should go: on one side, Wall Street investors and the largest coffee retailer in the world. On the other side, Ethiopian farmers who make almost nothing.

Then, factor in the knowledge that only 10 percent of the money it costs for a cup of coffee of this quality goes to Ethiopians, and the decision is clear.

Sure, the ideal solution would be to give the impoverished nation of Ethiopia exclusive naming rights.

However, the problem is that most consumers don't care enough to know about where their coffee comes from and how much the people growing it are paid.

In some respects, one of the best ways for grass-roots activists to change the world is for them to give up grass-roots activism.

This is not to say that this type of activism is ineffective or unimportant; countless examples indicate otherwise. But sometimes we forget that the power to change the world so often exists in the institutions most activists don't dare to associate with — for example, multinational corporations.

Somewhere out there, someone drinking fair-trade coffee just cringed.

HUGO CHAVEZ RECEIVES UNPRECEDENTED POWERS IN VENEZUELA

CARACAS, Venezuela — President Hugo Chavez was granted free rein Wednesday to accelerate changes in broad areas of society by presidential decree — a move critics said propels Venezuela toward dictatorship.

Convening in a downtown plaza in a session that resembled a political rally, lawmakers unanimously gave Chavez sweeping powers to legislate by decree and impose his radical vision of a more egalitarian socialist state.

“Long live the sovereign people! Long live President Hugo Chavez! Long live socialism!” said National Assembly President Cilia Flores as she proclaimed the “enabling law” approved by a show of hands.

The law gives Chavez, more power than he has ever had in eight years as president, and he plans to use it over the next 18 months to transform broad areas of public life, from the economy and the oil industry in particular, to “social matters” and the very structure of the state.

GERMANY ISSUES ARREST WARRANTS FOR SUSPECTED CIA AGENTS

BERLIN — German prosecutors said Wednesday that they have issued arrest warrants for 13 suspected CIA agents who allegedly abducted a German citizen in an apparent anti-terrorist operation gone wrong.

It was Washington’s second European ally to seek the arrest of purported CIA agents for spiriting away a terrorism suspect.

Munich prosecutor Christian Schmidt-Sommerfeld told The Associated Press that warrants in the latest case were issued in the last few days. He said the unidentified agents were sought on suspicion of wrongfully imprisoning Khaled al-Masri and causing him serious bodily harm.

Al-Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, says he was detained in December 2003 at the Serbian-Macedonian border and then flown by the CIA to a jail in Afghanistan, where he was abused. He says he was let go in Albania five months later and told he had been seized in a case of mistaken identity.

NORWEGIAN CRUISE SHIP RUNS AGROUND IN ANTARCTIC

OSLO, Norway — A Norwegian cruise ship carrying nearly 300 passengers, including 119 Americans, ran aground on a remote Antarctic island and damaged its hull before getting free, officials said Wednesday. No one was injured.

The M/S Nordkapp got off the rocks under its own steam and sought shelter in a nearby harbor, where the 294 passengers were being transferred to a sister ship as a precaution, said Hanne K. Kristiansen, a spokeswoman for Norwegian Coastal Voyage.

She said there was no danger to those aboard or to the Nordkapp after the incident in the Southern Ocean.

Another Norwegian Coastal Vessel, the M/S Nordnorge, sailed into Walker Bay and the passengers were being transferred onto it in small boats usually used for sightseeing. The Nordnorge will then take them to Ushuaia, Argentina, a roughly 40-hour trip.

New Manhattan grocery store steeped with family tradition

Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Flush, Kan., is a tiny town east of Manhattan with a special tie to a growing Kansas company. It’s named for the family behind the Ray’s Apple Market grocery store chain, which will celebrate the grand opening of one of its Manhattan stores next month.

The community was settled by and named for a family of German immigrants by the name of Floersch. Tom Floersch, who owns the chain of stores with his brother Mike, said the name of the town was changed to Flush when the residents applied for a post office, because Floersch was too complicated.

Tom and Mike’s ancestor, H.J. Floersch, was one of the early settlers and ran the local general store. Ray Floersch, his descendant and Tom and Mike’s father, opened his first grocery store in Seneca, Kan., in 1965 and another in Clay Center, Kan.

Ray’s sons renamed the grocery chain for him after his death in 1984. The stores in Seneca and Clay Center are still open, and there are also stores in Council Grove, Kan., and Fairbury, Neb.

Floersch’s sons purchased two former Food 4 Less stores in Manhattan, at 222 N. Sixth

St. and 3011 Anderson Ave., and assimilated them into the chain. They remodeled the downtown store and are planning a grand opening for Feb. 7.

“We just wanted to give our customers a clean, pleasant place to shop,” Tom said.

He said work to update the west side Ray’s should start in May.

“I like shopping at Ray’s better than the larger stores, because you don’t have to fight the crowds, and it has a much nicer atmosphere,” said Erin Welte, junior in social work. “They also have great fresh meat and produce sections.”

The customers aren’t the only people who say they benefit from the growth of Ray’s.

“I have a great job here,” said Jon Shaneyfelt, who has worked at the downtown store since it opened last year. “Everyone works well together, and we all enjoy being here.”

A mural painted above the checkout lanes in the downtown store depicts significant pieces of the family’s history. It includes the original general store in Flush, Ray’s original store in Seneca, and even the old Floersch homestead located near Rock Creek High School.

Tom and Mike said they have a deep respect and appreciation for their father’s work and are honored to continue his legacy.

“He would love this,” Tom said. “He would be so proud.”

Surprise of the game

K-State handling the ball effectively

K-State committed just 14 turnovers against Missouri's pressure defense. The Wildcats handled Missouri's double teams effectively, something they struggled to do in a 24-turnover performance against the Tigers on Jan. 13. Missouri junior Stefhon Hannah, who ranks third in the nation in steals at more than three per game, failed to record a takeaway. The rest of the Tigers managed to get nine steals from the Wildcats.

Turning point

The Wildcats' late run

Cartier Martin's left-elbow jumper with 8:02 remaining pulled the Wildcats within four points and sparked a 13-0 run. Martin scored the first seven points of the run, including a pair of free throws to give K-State the lead for good. Junior David Hoskins capped the run with a three-point play to put K-State ahead 65-58. Hoskins finished with 25 points.

Stat of the game

K-State dominated the boards once again, out-rebounding the Tigers 41-19. The Wildcats held a 41-17 edge on the glass when the two teams met Jan. 13.

"They wanted it more than us on the boards, and it showed both games," Hannah said.

Game MVP

Cartier Martin displayed the type of efficient play he showed frequently last season, tallying 22 points and 11 rebounds. He was 6-of-9 from the field, 2-of-2 from 3-point range and 8-of-8 from the foul line.

"That may be as complete a game as Cartier's had since I've been here," coach Bob Huggins said.

Martin's performance is even more impressive considering he almost didn't play. Martin "banged his knee in shoot-around," Huggins said.

K-STATE VS. MISSOURI

Keep 'em coming

Jeffrey Rake

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Stefhon Hannah decided not to come to K-State after initially signing a letter of intent in the offseason, spurning the Wildcats in favor of Missouri.

As it turns out, K-State is doing just fine without him.

The Wildcats (16-6, 5-2 Big 12) defeated Missouri 80-73 Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum, despite Hannah's game-high, 27-point performance. Hannah, a junior-college transfer, finished 10-of-16 from the field.

Still, Missouri was no match for the Wildcats, who relied on a pair of upperclassmen to carry them to victory.

Senior Cartier Martin scored 16 of his 22 points in the second half and finished with 11 rebounds, while junior David Hoskins added 25 points and six rebounds on 7-of-14 shooting.

It all resulted in K-State sweeping the season series against the Tigers for the second time in three years and picking up its sixth-straight win in the process.

"Kansas State is probably just a little bit tougher than us at this point in time," Missouri coach Mike Anderson said. "We just couldn't make the plays when it counted."

Trailing 71-68 with 1:31 left, the Tigers (13-7, 2-5 Big 12) seemingly made a critical stop after forcing junior Blake Young into a wild shot that clanged off the rim. Hoskins was there for the follow-up, however, and tipped in the miss to give the Wildcats a five-point advantage. K-State made 5-of-6 free throws to seal the game.

"I thought (Hoskins) played really strong in the second half," coach Bob Huggins said. "We were able to get him isolated a little more tonight. He's a hard matchup when he makes shots."

And the Wildcats are a tough matchup when they out-hustle their opponents. Getting loose balls and grabbing rebounds was the key for K-State, which out-rebounded the Tigers 41-19 and scored 24 second-chance points.

"Those guys are just quick to the ball," Anderson said. "I think the difference probably is that we gave one or two efforts, and they gave three or four. When you do that you are going to get some of those loose balls. I think that was the difference."

K-State's Cartier Martin celebrates with fans following the Wildcats' 80-73 win over Missouri. Martin scored 22 points against and 11 rebounds against the Tigers.

Senior Akeem Wright finished with 12 points and eight rebounds.

Missouri junior Marshall Brown scored 16 points and freshman Keon Lawrence added 15 points on 7-of-10 shooting.

K-State opened with an early 16-5 lead after scoring the first 10 points of the game. The Wildcats made 6-of-10 field goals during the stretch and connected on two 3-point attempts, leading to a 36-33 halftime lead.

Then the wheels momentarily came off after the half.

The Tigers pulled ahead by five just three minutes into the second half after Hannah made three quick shots - including a pair of 3-pointers - to help the Tigers take a 46-41 lead.

Martin brought K-State back, scoring 12 points in an eight-minute stretch and giving the Wildcats a 59-58 lead with 6:15 left. K-State maintained the lead the rest of the way.

"We're playing as a team," Martin said. "When the offense is not going well, we find a way to get it done on the defensive end. I think the main thing for us is to just stay together, keep playing aggressive and play our style of ball."

The win gives the Wildcats a 113-112 all-time series advantage. Or does it?

Neither school can decide on the outcome of a game that took place Feb. 12, 1913 in Manhattan. K-State claims it won the game 26-25, while Missouri's media guide has the game scored as a 25-24 Tigers win.

K-State coach Bob Huggins yells at a call Wednesday evening during the Wildcats 80-73 win over Missouri. The Wildcats travel to Austin to face Texas Saturday.

Hannah shines in defeat

Congratulations K-State fans - you almost ruined the win streak.

CEDRIQUE FLEMMING

You trash-talked Missouri guard Stefhon Hannah and made him mad. In warmups for Wednesday's 80-73 victory over the Tigers in Bramlage Coliseum, 11,399 fans continuously heckled Hannah.

All throughout the game, fans would start chanting "momma's boy," among other things. This was due to the fact that Hannah signed a letter of intent to play for K-State but instead chose Missouri because his mother preferred he go there.

Hannah heard all of this from the crowd, and you could see in his eyes from the beginning he wanted to make them pay for their remarks by having an amazing game.

He did just that as he poured in several shots on his way to tying his season high with 27 points. He was 10-of-16 from the field, knocked down six 3-pointers and dished out six assists.

Lucky for the fans, K-State was able to score just enough at the right moments to take down Missouri and extend the win streak to six games, but Hannah and the Tigers made it interesting down the stretch.

Hannah had 17 second-half points, which included 4-of-4 shooting from 3-point land.

I couldn't believe what I was seeing. It didn't seem like he was going to miss.

He drained a three at the 19:01 mark that gave Missouri its first lead of the game at 38-36.

The Tigers went on to take a seven-point lead, but the Wildcats were able to rally and retake the lead.

K-State won, but Hannah proved that he can really play. He would have been a huge addition to a Wildcat squad that could use another effective point guard.

Hannah came into the game averaging 3.2 steals, which is third in the nation. If he was a Wildcat, his 15.3-point-per-game average would make him the leading scorer for K-State this year.

K-State point guard, junior Client Stewart, averages only six points per game. He is behind Hannah in almost every other statistical category.

The Wildcat players said after the game that they didn't need Hannah on their team, but I beg to differ.

Don't get me wrong - K-State is a quality team without him, but I guarantee they definitely would be better if he were here.

K-State will be fine without Hannah, but I hope the fans learned their lesson.

Stop talking trash on opposing players' mothers, because they'll make you pay just like Hannah did Wednesday.

K-State suffers second-half drought, Colorado goes on 23-0 run

By Dayne Logan

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Kimberly Dietz drives against KU during a 59-55 victory Jan. 24.

Colorado went on a 23-0 run in the second half to come back from a 15-point deficit and beat K-State 66-55 Wednesday.

Despite opening up a lead early in the second half, K-State suffered a dry spell that lasted more than 10 minutes.

That spell turned what once seemed like an insurmountable lead into a deficit the Wildcats never overcame.

Jackie McFarland, averaging 18.7 points and 10.8 rebounds per game this season, opened the game with a quick layup, but an 8-0 run, which spanned the next two minutes, allowed the Wildcats to take an early lead.

The Buffaloes responded with a run of their own to tie the game, and McFarland looked poised to take the lead with 16:15 remaining, but junior Shana Wheeler blocked her shot.

The Wildcats could not deny McFarland for long, and by the 14:30 mark she increased her total to six points, giving Colorado a slender 10-8 lead.

The Wildcats managed to fight back once again, and following the team's second 8-0 run of the evening, opened up a six-point lead.

Colorado forward Hannah Skildum stopped the run with a layup at the 11:26 mark, but K-State's hot shooting continued.

Consecutive baskets by senior Claire Coggins increased the K-State lead to 28-16, but the highlight of the half came from junior Kimberly Dietz.

During a series which saw the Colorado offense turn the ball over on five straight possessions, Dietz hit back-to-back 3-pointers.

At halftime, K-State led 39-24. Coggins and Dietz led the Wildcats in scoring with 13 and 11 points respectively, while McFarland and teammate Whitney Houston shared the honors for the Buffaloes with seven each.

The Wildcats' ability to rebound also was impressive in the first half - something that had been missing for them recently. K-State out-rebounded Colorado 19-16 in the half.

The Wildcats started the second half just as they had finished the first, opening things up with a quick jumper from Wheeler, but the forward left the floor seconds later after picking up her fourth foul.

The Buffaloes quickly capitalized on Wheeler's absence, and at the end of a 10-0 run, reduced the deficit to five. Bianca Smith led the charge with five points in less than a minute.

With 11:37 remaining, coach Deb Patterson reinserted Wheeler into the game, but she was forced to return to the bench permanently 30 seconds later after picking up her fifth foul.

By the time Dietz ended the suffering at the 3:31 mark, her team trailed the Buffaloes by six. The Wildcats would never get any closer.

K-State has lost four of its last five games. The Wildcats will be back in action at 4:30 p.m. Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum.

CNV goal to end violence before it manifests itself

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For 64 days, students and faculty will convey the message of nonviolence and social justice to people on the K-State campus and in Manhattan.

The days signify the Season for Nonviolence and span from Jan. 30 to April 4. The dates mark the anniversaries of the deaths of Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King.

The Season for Nonviolence began internationally in 1998 as a way to bring nonviolence to the forefront of people's minds, and the Campaign for Nonviolence, or CNV, brought it to K-State in 2000.

In previous years, the campaign arranged its own community nonviolence walk, but this year they will walk as a part of Manhattan's St. Patrick's Day parade. Everyone is invited to walk and carry peaceful signs. In the past, walkers carried signs that said, 'Peace is every step,' 'If you want peace work for justice' and 'Got peace?'

"The whole point of the signs is to help people think about conflict in their lives and ways you can resolve conflict without resorting to violence itself," said Susan Allen, director of K-State's Women's Center and a founder of the local CNV chapter.

Allen helped bring the Season for Nonviolence to the K-State campus after reading information on the observance.

"At my job as director of the Women's Center, we kept taking care of people after the violence, but we didn't want to keep just doing that," Allen said. "We wanted to help prevent it."

Though violence is not something many students believe is a big issue on our campus, Allen said, we must constantly fight it. Statistically, on a campus K-State's size, there are 400 rapes each year.

"The reason for this season is to help people see the violence and learn ways we can stop it," she said. "The truth is there is no place in this world that is totally nonviolent. It's something we have to work on everyday."

Many students have helped plan the events for this year's Season for Nonviolence.

"I think it's important to K-State, because it brings an awareness to the campus and the community about nonviolence and that there are alternatives to violence," said Kristina Kramer, senior in sociology.

The events will include multiple films on social issues like the war in Iraq, fair trade and violence in the media. Also Medea Benjamin, co-founder of Global Exchange and Co-Pink, a women's antiwar movement, will speak.

"She talks about alternatives to war," Kramer said. "So people will understand that war is not the only answer."

Jimmy Strickland, junior in public relations, said he is glad K-State takes part in the Season for Nonviolence.

"It's a great message," Strickland said. "Personally I think fighting and violence are a waste of time."

Though many people automatically picture physical violence when they think of violence in general, Allen said it is important to realize there are many different types of violence. The events for the Season of Nonviolence will touch on many of these types.

"I think of nonviolence in levels," she said. "We're not just talking about peace and war. We're talking about personal mental health and how we get along in relationships, also how a community or school gets along."

Allen said a key to stopping nonviolence is to keep balance and fairness in all levels of relationships. This includes fairness in romances, at the office and between students and teachers.

"If things aren't well-balanced, they're going to fall over," she said. "Think of our mind; if your mind isn't well-balanced, you're going to flip out."

Nonviolence is something that can be learned and taught, Allen said. Introductory and applied nonviolence courses now are offered at K-State.

"In our world we're taught all about wars, and everyone knows about fighting," Allen said. "We're kind of wired for survival of the fittest. I think if students went to any of the events it would help just get that into their minds, that human beings really need to change their minds about how we handle conflict."

Allen said she already sees a change on campus; 450 K-State students have volunteered their time to helping others through CNV's Safezone. This program is designed to provide a safe environment for victims of violence, such as hateful acts and sexual violence on campus.

"I think this is huge," Allen said. "The whole point is to give people a place to go before they are in crisis."

The season is also known for the "64 Ways to Practice Nonviolence." The list has ways to fit nonviolence into your life.

All the events and activities for the Season for Nonviolence are free and open to the public.

PROPOSAL | Sebelius' proposal gets SGA nod working with legislators, Regents and Kansans on implementing this plan so we can create a brighter future for our students and for our entire state."

Lucas Maddy, student body president, said he was pleased in Sebelius' commitment to a plan.

"Obviously, it's not the full amount, but it's a substantial amount," said Maddy, senior in agricultural technology management. "I think that we're very pleased that it's something other than gambling that really has a chance to make it through and seems viable."

On Feb. 7, about 10 Student Governing Association representatives from each Regents university will attend Higher Education Day in Topeka. Student Governing Association representatives will meet with state legislators for discussion on deferred maintenance, Maddy said.

Ian Staples, the SGA legislative director for the University of Kansas, said Sebelius' proposal is a creative solution to the deferred maintenance problem.

"We're looking forward to what the legislature and the Regents have to say," said Staples, senior in political science at KU. "We're glad Sebelius is looking for a solution that doesn't raise taxes for Kansas' residents but still fixes the problem for Kansas institutions."

MINIMUM WAGE | Differences in current student wages cause issues for future changes

thought about what kind of effect a wage increase would have on the budget, said Bruce Shubert, associate vice president of administration and finance.

However, the university will need to balance the cost with other costs, he said.

"The cost increase associated with that plan would be one need among several, so I believe there will be a best effort to meet our needs — maybe to reprioritize, maybe to move things to multiple years — to fund that need within the agreed upon student rate change," Shubert said.

About 3,600 students are paid from the general use budget which is funded from tuition and state money. Wages for the remaining student employees come from department budgets, like Housing and Dining Services.

K-State allocated $2,883,792 of the fiscal year 2007 general use fund for undergraduate and graduate student salaries.

If wages move from $6 an hour to $7.25 an hour, that would be a 20.8 percent increase. Apply that increase to the general use budget and it would be about $3,484,582.

Increases in the general use fund are needed, not just for possible student wage increases, but also for faculty salary enhancements, undergraduate experience enhancements and academic program enhancements, according to the Five-Year Tuition Strategy Proposal that the Kansas Board of Regents will hear in May.

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Bramlage Coliseum concessions worker Drew Jacobson, sophomore at Wamego High School, helps a customer prior to K-State's game against Missouri on Wednesday.

The proposal includes an increase of tuition by $15 per credit hour each year for the next five years. It was approved by the Student Governing Association last spring.

Also included in the proposal is an increase in the campus minimum wage to $6.50 by fiscal year 2012.

Another issue the university will have to tackle is how to pay those who were making more than the minimum wage, which could cause a ripple effect.

"If you have one person making $6.15 now and another making $6, are you just going to raise everybody to $7.25?" Shubert asked. "I think that's probably something that is difficult to measure from a central perspective. I think that would vary a lot from unit to unit."

Like many other businesses do, K-State will have to make its budget work, Shubert said. That includes increases in costs, like minimum wage.

"Whenever it is that we have to deal with that need, it will kind of be taken in context with the other needs of that year," he said.

Housing and Dining Services will take a similar approach when evaluating budget allocations to compensate for student salary increases, said Bob Burgess, associate director of business operations and technology services for Housing and Dining Services.

"Impacts on bottom line and budgets translate into rate discussions down the road," Burgess said.

Burgess said a need for a larger budget to compensate for student wage increases could result in an increase in prices for services. However, a tighter budget will not mean job cuts, he said.

"I do not see it having an impact on the number of student employees we hire," he said. "There are functions students perform. Those functions will remain critical to our delivery of service."

Body language expert weighs in on body behavior

Reading other people's minds. This might seem impossible, but with a little help from a body language expert, such a feat is attainable.

Patti Wood said she became interested in the field of body language by being a keen observer.

"I was a power singer, and always the one with a pad of paper at the corner watching others," Wood said. "I got a course in Florida from a body language expert. He told me, 'I was looking at you today when I wanted to do...'"

Wood said she learned a lot from the course, including how to read a person's body language.

Personal advice

Wood said she has learned a lot from the course, including how to read a person's body language.

"Typically, if someone is nervous, they will give off what I call 'tension cues,' which say 'I'm not sure, I'm not sure,'" she said.

She said women try to make themselves smaller by bringing up their shoulders and rounding their feet together.

"They also will look at whom they want to approach, and then look away quickly," she said.

Joel Campbell, sophomore in business management, said he believes these aren't the only signs of a woman's approachability.

"If she looks at you and gives you a big smile, it's a go-ahead to talk to her," he said. "If she has a stuck-up look on her face or doesn't make it obvious she knows you're there, then I wouldn't."

Men have a different way of using body language, Wood said.

"It's more about showing off when it comes to men," Wood said. "They want to appear to be the biggest, with the best genetic makeup."

They will jut their chins out and lean up against a wall. Unfortunately, this can actually make them more difficult for a woman to approach."

RELATIONSHIPS

Wood said there also are cues in relationships to tell if the person is lying.

"Many cues can just be nervousness, so it's important to be careful not to misinterpret them," Wood said. "However, there are many clear deception cues, such as rapid blinking."

Eyes can reveal a lot, Campbell agreed.

"A good way to tell if someone is lying is if they sway a lot and don't look you in the eye," he said.

Wood said the mouth is the window to truth.

"If someone is lying, they will often suck in their lips, as if keeping a secret, and the next thing out is usually a lie," she said.

Another sign is licking the lips, as if erasing a lie. This happens in a quick left-to-right motion, not a seductive way. Rubbing the mouth with a hand, or rubbing the eyes or ears is a way of saying, "This doesn't seem right," and should be looked for, she said.

INTERVIEWS

Most employers make hiring decisions within the first 10 seconds of a job interview, Wood said. Proper body language can help a potential employee interview with confidence and get the job.

"Instead of dumping your stuff down and sitting in a chair, keep standing so that the first thing your potential employer sees is you upright," she said. "It's also important to shake hands right away, even if he or she does not offer their hand first."

People also should not sit lazily in their seat but be erect and energetic, she said.

This advice is something with which local employers agree.

"How you sit in your chair can say a lot," said John Callagy, Best Buy general manager.

He said slouching and excessive leg movement is bad body language.

Wood said body language is important because of the lack of face-to-face interactions.

"Technology has led us to not meet in person as much now, so when we do, the image we give off is very important," she said.

Brandy sued for $50 million

LOS ANGELES — The parents of a woman killed in a freeway crash involving Brandy sued the actress-singer for $50 million Tuesday.

The wrongful-death suit claims Brandy was driving recklessly when her Land Rover struck the back of a Honda driven by Awatef Aboudihaj, 38, "The Insider" first reported.

"The accident was a terrible tragedy, and Brandy's heart goes out to Awatef Aboudihaj's family," spokesman Allan Mayer said in a statement.

It comes a day after the California Highway Patrol recommended Brandy be charged with misdemeanor vehicular manslaughter in the Dec. 30 accident.

Aboudihaj's car hit another vehicle, slid sideways into the center divider and was then hit by another car, the report said.

Brandy, 27, whose real name is Brandy Norwood, who earned a Grammy in 1999, has made five albums. She has acted for film and television, starring on the sitcom "Moesha" from 1996-2001 and most recently as a judge for NBC's "America's Got Talent."

DRINK OF THE WEEK | Great libations to order at a bar or make at home

Tarantulas at Auntie Mae's Parlor

Bartender Bro Pemberton makes a Tarantula at Auntie Mae's Parlor. Pemberton has bartended there for about seven years.

He said he enjoys being a bartender at Auntie Mae's.

"It's the best bar in Aggieville," he said. "It hasn't really changed in the last 30 years, and people like that. It's got different music and a different crowd."

He said the Tarantula has been Auntie Mae's signature drink for the last 10 to 12 years.

"Most people order it because it's strong and fruity," he said.

— Compiled by Eileen Lax

Auntie Mae's recipe for a tarantula

- Mix equal parts vodka, gin, rum, tequila and triple sec.
- Follow with equal parts 7-Up, Sour mix and pineapple juice.
- Top it off with grenadine.

Groundhog to venture out today

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Today is the day in which, according to rural American tradition, the groundhog will predict whether or not there will be six more weeks of winter.

The most famous groundhog, Punxsutawney Phil, in Punxsutawney Penn., will venture out to an adoring public and much media attention. But the reliability of using a groundhog to predict winter isn't to be trusted, Kari Springstead, fourth-year student in veterinary medicine said.

"I'm pretty sure it's not accurate at all," she said.

The tradition of Groundhog Day goes back to the 1700s, when the German settlers brought a tradition known as Candlemas Day, according to Stormfax Weather Almanac.

The earliest reference in the United States came on Feb. 4, 1841, and can be found at the Pennsylvania Dutch Folklore Center at Franklin and Marshall College.

"Last Tuesday, the second, was Candlemas day, the day on which, according to the Germans, the Groundhog peeps out of his winter quarters. If he sees his shadow, he pops back for another six weeks' nap," Stormfax states. "But if the day be cloudy he remains out, the weather is to be moderate."

Lawmakers float alternate funding plan

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, Kan. (AP) — Alternatives to Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' plan to use Kansas Turnpike tolls to pay for repairs at state universities already are floating among legislators, including a proposal to require college towns to impose special property tax levies.

Sebelius wants to provide $575 million over six years to the six state universities to help them tackle a backlog of building repairs and maintenance. Her plan includes issuing $300 million in bonds, then paying them off with revenues generated by higher turnpike tolls.

Some prominent Republicans were searching Thursday for alternatives, only a day after Sebelius proposed her tolls-for-universities plan. Some GOP leaders argue turnpike fees should be used to maintain and improve the toll road, and the trucking industry views Sebelius' proposed toll increases — 25 percent, phased in over seven years — as burdensome.

"There's always an alternative here to any issue, and so there's several that are in play," said House Speaker Melvin Neufeld, R-Ingalls.

U.S. Cavalry Museum displays military memorabilia from various films

A piece of Hollywood history is on display at Fort Riley.

The U.S. Cavalry Museum is featuring an exhibit of more than two dozen costumes from cavalry films, including costumes worn by John Wayne, Danny Glover, Charlton Heston and Kevin Costner.

Bill McKale, museum curator, said he heard about the exhibit when it was at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library and Museum in California.

John Langelier, assistant director of the Reagan museum, talked with McKale about bringing the privately owned collection to Fort Riley.

Langelier, who graduated from

K-State in 1982 with a doctorate in military history, said the exhibit was at the library for about a year as part of an exhibit on the Hollywood cowboy.

The exhibit helps differentiate between the Hollywood cowboy persona and U.S. history, Langelier said.

"Popular culture has a very important impact in formulating our ideas, but it isn't always correct," he said. "It's a good way for students to look at how things have been presented and see how films have changed over the years. It's a good way to look at how people from different time periods look at things."

The exhibit opened Dec. 7, 2006, and will remain at the museum until August.

McKale said there was increased interest in the museum and exhibit during December and the holiday season since more families were at Fort Riley.

McKale said viewing the exhibit is a tremendous opportunity for K-State students and faculty, especially history, apparel marketing and theater majors.

"To see an exhibit of this quality in this part of the country is really a unique opportunity for people," he said. "It's (an) opportunity to see these costumes that have really come to embody the army's role in the settlement of the West."

"When these costumes leave here and go back to California, they will probably not make their way back to this part of the country."

Freda Salazar, California resident, visited the museum and Hollywood exhibit with her daughter-in-law and grandchildren to see the history of Fort Riley.

"There's a lot of history here," Salazar said. "You could stay here all day long to read about everything, and it's very educational for children. It's interesting how they can bring things from the old days and show it to today."

Student group to protest waiting period for pay at KU game

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Those attending the men's basketball game against the University of Kansas on Feb. 19 will be greeted not just by popcorn vendors and security officials but also by protesters.

The protesters will rally against the two-week waiting period for new employees to receive paychecks, the minimum-wage rate and the lack of hard evidence given to offenders, said Marcellous Cage, organizer of the protest.

"We just want to try to get K-State and the community in the active role in their government," Cage, senior in sociology, said. "It's to get the community motivated."

One topic the group is protesting is the waiting period before employees get their first paychecks.

Julie Henton, assistant director of human resources in the payroll division, said there is a reason students employed by K-State don't get their paychecks for a month after they first begin working.

"From the first time you work until the first time you get your paycheck is about a month," she said. "The State of Kansas actually produces the paychecks. Our pay cycles are determined by the State of Kansas' regulations."

There are some solutions to the problem, Cage said in his protest release. These include employees getting paid for the first week after their second week, employees paying a safety deposit for any uniform they might have to purchase and take fees from the first paycheck.

K-State does not hold paychecks for anything, including uniforms, Henton said.

During previous protests around the country, Cage said the most influential protesters have been college students. However, Cage said students now are lazy, demonstrated by the lack of protests.

Cage and others also protested at the women's game against Kansas Jan. 24.

Cage said he didn't have as many people protesting with him as he would like because the Black Student Union had a conference that day.

"It didn't really go well," Cage said.

However, he anticipates a larger group protesting at the game against Kansas.

"It should go a lot better because ESPN will be there as well as the governor," he said. "It will also be

Super Bowl XLI: Bears vs. Colts

5 p.m. Dolphin Stadium, Miami Gardens, Fla.
Shown on CBS

If you're one of the lucky 70,000 fans to be seated in the stadium, enjoy the hot dogs.

But if you decided to pass on the road trip to Miami Gardens, your best bet is to find someone with a bigger, better television set than yours and join the party. Be a good house guest and offer to bring something tasty.

With 90 million people expected to be glued to their televisions Sunday, you can bet a lot of chips, salsa and beer will be consumed.

For those not interested in the game, here are some fun facts: Tiffany & Co. of New York makes the Super Bowl trophy. Last year, 141.4 million people watched the game and the most-watched programs in TV history all are Super Bowls.

Student Senate passes funding amendment

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate members passed an amendment to campus-wide and fine arts organizational funding statutes at their weekly meeting Thursday night.

The amendment allows members of campus-wide organizations and fine arts organizations to contest recommended monetary allocations by Student Governing Association's Allocations Committee if they are dissatisfied with the recommended allocations, according to the legislation.

"This piece of legislation is a brand-new reconsideration process which has been drafted by the Allocations Committee in order to better serve the students of the Kansas State University campus who decide to submit funding requests," said Nick Piper, chairman of the Allocations Committee and senior in finance.

Senate members also passed a constitutional amendment concerning legislative members of K-State's SGA. The bill will take effect at the beginning of the 2007-08 Student Senate term and upon ratification by six of nine college councils.

According to the legislation, SGA executive members could receive impeachment based on the illegal or improper performance of a legal and proper act or duty; misconduct of a wrongful act, especially by an elected or appointed official; or the failure to perform an act that is either an official duty or legal requirement.

Members of SGA's legislative branch also could receive expulsion based on the same grounds, according to the legislation.

Senate Operations Committee chairwoman said the legislation was changed from a majority vote to a two-thirds vote to follow parliamentary procedure and include more voices within Student Senate.

If SGA members wish to contest their impeachment or expulsion, they can testify to Senate Operations Committee, which is the committee that initially deals with the impeachment or expulsion. If the impeachment or expulsion passes through the committee, SGA members also can testify to the entire Student Senate body, said Schmeidler, senior in animal sciences and industry.

"By having the legislation to include expulsions, it gives more authority to this body specifically to hold each other accountable," Schmeidler said. "So instead of just having one committee draft a piece of legislation about one senator in this room, expulsions allow all fellow senators to hold one another accountable through expulsions."

Breadbasket asks for donations with 'Souper Bowl' food drive

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Flint Hills Breadbasket is asking for food donations outside Dillons in West Loop Saturday. The "Souper Bowl Food Collection" will collect non-perishable food items from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. to give to needy families during the remainder of the winter.

"We encourage folks to bring down soup to help us stock our shelves for the upcoming winter months," said Natascha Phillip, executive director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

The food drive takes place every year before the big game. This is its 15th year, Phillip said.

"We will take any type of non-perishable food item, although we are really short on peanut butter and jelly, macaroni and cheese, pancake mix, cold cereal, spaghetti and spaghetti sauce," she said.

Phillip said greek houses, schools, residence halls, clubs and other organizations are encouraged to do their own food drives to help out.

"Anybody can participate

— just give the Breadbasket a call. If you already have food just give us a call and we'll come pick it up," she said.

Last year the Souper Bowl food drive collected 10,000 pounds of food. This year, organizers hope to collect 15,000 pounds of food because of increased need, Phillip said.

Phillip said she encourages people to buy a little extra while picking up their groceries at Dillons and donate it to the drive.

Randy Plummer, general manager of Dillons, declined to comment for this story.

THE FORUM

forum@spub.ksu.edu

The Forum is the Collegian's reader feedback system. The Forum is edited to eliminate vulgar, racist, obscene and libelous comments. The comments are not the opinion of the Collegian nor are they endorsed by the editorial staff.

This is a test. This is only a test of the Forum coming back to life.

Josh Martin
JUNIOR IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

After reading an article that was recently published in the Kansas City Star Feb. 1, I was completely outraged. It was about Sofia Salva, the woman who was pulled over in Kansas City for having a fake temporary tag in the window of her car. Pleading to police officers that she was having a miscarriage and needed immediate medical care, she was instead sent to jail. The next day, her premature baby only lived one minute. I can't believe the Collegian didn't have any coverage over such an important issue. Instead of publishing stories about Hot Pocket theft, I think the Collegian should publish articles that have a greater importance in our society.

Michelle Palmer
FRESHMAN IN ART

Please send submissions via K-State e-mail to forum@spub.ksu.edu. All comments must be signed.

TO THE POINT

An editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Please send us your thoughts, opinions

The Collegian has experimented with its reader feedback system since fall of this year.

First, the size of the Forum was substantially reduced. At the beginning of this semester, the Forum as it then existed was done away with.

The original plan was to replace the old system with an e-mail system where users would sign their comments before publication.

Now, we're looking into adding text messaging as another option.

As producers of this paper we are well aware that many people are unhappy with these decisions, but we cannot and will not go back.

The Forum as it existed was a gigantic liability. The Collegian, on several occasions, was spared a lawsuit on the good graces and understanding of others – we can't always count on being so lucky.

In addition to this, people arguably have lost their jobs because of Forum comments.

We are sorry these are not things the student body as a whole finds compelling, but they are facts we were forced to stare in the face on a daily basis.

This risk was not worth the benefit.

But, we remain the newspaper of K-State students first and foremost – we want nothing more than to create something the Wildcats can enjoy and be proud of.

As we are your paper, we will ask you: how can the Collegian's reader feedback section be improved?

Realizing that we cannot return to the system we had, we want K-Staters to tell us how we can improve their paper.

The Collegian editors are listening.

Quid pro quo

After all their suffering, President Wefald owes Jardine residents for months of noise, muck

Illustration by Nate Schmidt | COLLEGIAN

I'm a firm believer in "give a little, get a little." Having said that, come warm weather Jon Wefald needs to wash my car.

The way I see it, after nine months of endless construction, the K-State president owes me and my wheels a washing – I'll even provide the soap.

Early last summer when I got all leased up on Jardine Apartments I knew there was work a-going on. What I did not know is that K-State's engineers are involved in an epic improvement project focused on building the largest, deepest and dankest mud pits the world has ever seen.

For those who have never been awoken by a 10-ton bulldozer gently scraping asphalt 200 feet from your front door; my friends, you have been robbed of an experience. A tooth-grinding, vein-blowing, stomach-flipping experience.

Day in and out, into the night, even Saturdays.

No birds, no flowers, not even K-State's trademark morbidly obese squirrels; just the grind, grind, pound, thud, yaaaaaaarrrrrhhhh, bzzzzrt, kaboom, of progress, construction and manual laborers accidentally leaning against open electrical lines.

Then, one day, blessed, blessed silence. I ran to the window, joy in my heart. No track-hoes, no trenchers, not even a fork-lift – frabjous day!

But, in the immortal words of Al Pacino in "Scent of a Woman" – "I'm just getting warmed up."

Stretch back to geography class, and you'll remember that once retaining vegetation is gone, mud ensues, and every last blade of grass in the entire complex has been ripped out, torn up or paved over – with the one or two hangers-on poisoned out of spite.

When you get our rainy autumns and this stupid, cold, white stuff that refuses to go away, Jardine sinks.

Being spawned from the radioactive goo which comprises north Louisiana, I know mud. But this is grass land – mud ain't right in this part of the country, and this mud doesn't belong anywhere. The stuff loafs around looking patchy and surly, a sort of that if it were a person would have jailhouse tattoos of "mom," only misspelled. It doesn't coat so much as penetrate.

Being good neighbors and a model of multiculturalism (ask my neighbor from Nepal, the Chinese women past that and the pigeons on the roof), we tried to address the situation with unity. Sadly, the initial enthusiasm we shared soon gave way to apathy, as we tried desperately to ignore the cries, "Hey, my car sunk," "Get off the rug," "Aaaargh, my children," "Gimmie back my shoes," etc.

But, getting back to the big cheese.

Alright Jon, here's the deal: I've done the endless vacuuming, spent months welding muck off my windshield so I can see enough to drive, seen my mop reduced to a sobbing mess and had perfectly good Wal-Mart brand shoes reduced to K-Mart quality junk.

I've had to dodge heavy equipment on my bike, rampaging trucks on foot. I've waded and slogged and huffed through this mess until I look like Swamp Thing.

I've even gotten tickets from Parking Services for unknown infractions despite the fact that our parking lot looks like Godzilla went frolicking through the Everglades.

After all of this, as a token of your good will, you need to wash my car.

That rascal hasn't seen the business end of a scrub brush since before August, and my ride is starting to look eerily like the Loch Ness Nissan.

As a gesture that you acknowledge the sacrifice the residents of Jardine have made for K-State's muddy holes, wash our cars, Jon. We've earned it.

News organizations should focus on news, not private matters

After discussing several world and national political issues, CNN anchor Wolf Blitzer drilled Vice President Dick Cheney about the pregnancy of his lesbian daughter on the Jan. 24 episode of his show, "The Situation Room."

Blitzer: Your daughter, Mary. She's pregnant ... do you want to respond to that?

Cheney: No.

Blitzer: She's, obviously, a good daughter –

Cheney: I'm delighted I'm about to have a sixth granddaughter, Wolf. And obviously I think the world of both my daughters and all of my grandchildren. And I think, frankly, you're out of line with that question.

Either CNN reporter Wolf Blitzer doesn't get the meaning of no, or he doesn't understand what an important story is.

There are two problems with this situation. First, it is an issue that needs to be solved within the family, and second, there is a plethora of issues that could be covered rather than Cheney's relationship with his daughter.

Cheney's daughter, Mary, is a lesbian, a fact which has earned public ire since her father took office in 2000. She also is pregnant.

Although Cheney never embraced his daughter publicly – in fact, he hasn't embraced anybody publicly – there are some issues in which he should be allowed to "keep in the family."

Cheney said he cares for his family, and that should be the end of the questions. Whether or not that is true is something Wolf Blitzer need not know.

It is impossible to decipher what mood Cheney is in anyway; given his perpetual about-to-bite-the-head-off-a-baby-bunny expression.

Of all the questions Cheney will snarl an answer to, there are more important questions to ask the president's right-hand man.

For instance: What is the plan in Iraq? Darfur? Iran? Anything else Cheney and the administration have muffed up?

One could almost feel sympathy for Cheney; it must be hard for a man so conservative to have a homosexual daughter, but the keyword is almost.

Behind the scowls and devilish grins that bring fear to all children younger than eight, Cheney has helped mastermind one of the biggest governmental flops in history.

Cheney led us to an unnecessary war in Iraq, at times shows no regard for public opinion or the troops overseas and shot his friend, who apparently looks like a quail or some other woodland creature, in the face with a shotgun.

One would think questions dealing with these issues would supersede that of a lesbian daughter, except maybe the shooting.

That's just funny – though not to his friend.

Leave the pregnancy issue alone – it's a problem he personally must face with his daughter, not on national television.

But I expect this from CNN, the same news channel that practically portrayed Barbaro, the reigning Kentucky Derby champion racehorse, as an inspiration to us all.

Soldiers die nearly every day. A new Democratic House and Senate are changing the political landscape of the Bush administration ... and news channels devote valuable time to horses and out-of-wedlock pregnancies.

News organizations should pursue stories that actually affect the public.

CNN, Fox News and all the others need to hold Cheney accountable for his political blunders, not his hereditary incongruities.

REPORT SAYS GLOBAL WARMING 'VERY LIKELY' CAUSED BY HUMANS

PARIS — The world's leading climate scientists, in their most powerful language ever used on the issue, said global warming "very likely" is man-made, according to a new report obtained Friday by The Associated Press.

The report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change — a group of hundreds of scientists and representatives of 113 governments — represents the most authoritative science on the issue. It was due for official release Friday morning in Paris.

"The observed widespread warming of the atmosphere and ocean, together with ice-mass loss, support the conclusion that it is extremely unlikely that global climate change of the past 50 years can be explained without external forcing, and very likely that is not due to known natural causes alone," according to the 20-page report.

The phrase "very likely" translates to a more than 90-percent certainty that global warming is caused by man.

What that means in layman's language is "we have this nailed," said top U.S. climate scientist Jerry Mahlman, who originated the percentage system.

U.S. REMOVES SADDAM PHOTO FROM GUANTANAMO AMID CRITICISM

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — A news report about Saddam Hussein's execution was removed from a recreation area at the Guantanamo Bay detention center after a detain-ee's lawyer accused officials of using it to frighten prisoners, a U.S. military spokesman said Thursday.

Authorities also removed an Arabic-language poster that depicted Saddam's capture, court appearances and death sentence, said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, a Guantanamo Bay spokesman.

The military decided the poster "appeared insensitive" and did not belong in the recreation area, where authorities post information about current events for detainees.

"The intent of this poster was to show that the Iraqi people are making progress and have delivered justice," Durand said in an e-mailed statement from the detention center on a U.S. Navy base in Cuba.

U.N. HOPES CHINESE PRESIDENT WILL PRESS SUDAN ON DARFUR

KHARTOUM, Sudan — The United Nations hopes the Chinese president will push for a solution to the Darfur crisis during his landmark visit to Sudan on Friday. But Khartoum expects its staunchest diplomatic ally to stick to boosting commercial ties, particularly those assuring its access to Sudan's oil.

The road to Khartoum's airport was lined with the red banners of communist China and the flag of Sudan's Muslim fundamentalist regime on Thursday ahead of Hu Jintao's two-day visit, the first by a Chinese president to Sudan.

China, which is the biggest foreign investor in Sudan and buys two-thirds of the country's oil exports, has used its veto-wielding status at the U.N.

Security Council to prevent harsh measures against Sudan over the Darfur conflict.

But Beijing has raised expectations that Hu might pressure Khartoum to show flexibility in ending Darfur's bloodshed.

In an unusual foray into the field of human rights, Chinese officials have called on Sudan to cooperate with the United Nations in finding a solution in Darfur. China usually avoids such public pronouncements under its proclaimed policy of refusing to interfere in what it considers other countries' internal affairs.

7TH AND FINAL POTTER BOOK SCHEDULED FOR PUBLICATION JULY 21

NEW YORK — Let it begin: the countdown, the party planning, the predictions, the meaning of it all.

The tears — for the end of Harry Potter.

The world's most anticipated book finale, "Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows," will come out midnight, July 21, according to author J.K. Rowling and her British and U.S. publishers, Bloomsbury and Scholastic, Inc.

The author posted a brief announcement on her Web site Thursday, followed soon by releases from her publishers.

The news landed like a silent meteor. "Deathly Hallows" almost instantly topped the best seller lists on Amazon.com and Barnes & Noble.com, displacing another industry titan, an Oprah Winfrey pick, Sidney Poitier's "The Measure of a Man."

LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT

Student action sparked legislative moves

We did it! The first step to safer, updated and more comfortable facilities on the K-State campus has been taken.

In a press conference Wednesday, Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius announced her Foundations for the Future plan to fund $575 million of deferred maintenance at K-State and the other five Kansas Board of Regents universities.

Sebelius is proposing legislation that would create a surcharge by the Kansas Turnpike Authority. The surcharge would not exceed 5 percent per year on tolls, and the funds would be collected over seven years. This legislation would collect $300 million to pay for deferred maintenance at our state's universities.

The governor's plan is a direct result of student efforts and was coordinated by student leaders of all six Regents universities. The culmination of this campaign was a press conference at the Kansas Capitol last semester.

In her press conference, Sebelius listed students as the number-one influence on her decision to pursue this issue, so congratulations.

More than 1,200 K-State students wrote postcards asking Sebelius to address deferred maintenance needs. This announcement's timing coincides with Student Appreciation Week sponsored by the Student Governing Association.

Our governor's response to student needs demonstrates that every single student, not just recognized campus leaders, can have an impact on improving student life at K-State.

Student columnist from 1920s writes of black contributions to nation's history

By F. Marshall Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Editor's note: When Frank Marshall Davis came to K-State in 1924, he was one of only 26 black students enrolled. He wrote a weekly column called "A Diplomat in Black," in which he discussed politics, history and campus life with humor and candor.

The Depression forced Davis to leave K-State one semester shy of graduation. He went on to work at a black newspaper in Chicago and edit another in Atlanta. He also published several books of poetry and his memoirs before his death in 1987.

The K-State Collegian published this column on Feb. 18, 1930. We ask readers to enjoy this piece of history.

There are few Americans who can think of George Washington, the father of his country, without remembering his role as colonial military leader in the great Revolutionary war. Nearly all remember the stories of the hardships undergone by his soldiers at Valley Forge, his crossing of the Delaware, and his marches and countermarches which eventually resulted in liberty for the American colonies. But those who know of the Negro's contributions to the War for Independence are very few.

Yet, fight he did. Not only in that war, but in every war the United States has engaged in with the exception of the Mexican War — and he might have been in that conflict, as it takes a mighty smart man to tell many a light-complexioned Negro from the Caucasian.

Perhaps it is significant that the first martyr of this great nation was a black man. Crispus Attucks died in the Boston Massacre on March 5, 1770.

Directly under the command of General Washington were 775 Negroes. Engaged in the war were 3,000 men of color. In addition to several black fighting units, there was an average of 35 black fighters in each white regiment.

A company of dark Americans fought at Bunker Hill, Mass. Peter Salem, a member of that group, fired the shot that mortally wounded Major Pitcairn of the British force.

Solomon Poor so distinguished himself there that some of the principal officers drew a petition to secure him recognition by the Massachusetts colony.

At Brandywine, Va., Beach Simpson distinguished himself. And in 1779 the Black Legion, organized at St. Domingo and composed of 800 black and mulatto freedmen, covered the retreat of the defeated French and American army at Savannah so successfully that the British could not annihilate their fleeing enemies as they seemed in danger of doing.

In fact, Negroes served in the armies of the Southern colonies, although not to any great extent. Only the close of the war prevented the mobilization of black fighting men in large numbers.

It's all a matter of history and record. The irony of the matter is that the Negro fought to secure independence from a country that freed her slaves before America did.

'Venus in Furs' showcases art by women

By Mark Sibilla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan has few venues at which the public is able to view local art talent. However, from Jan. 29 to Feb. 24, the Varney's Gallery will showcase "Venus in Furs," an all-female art show dedicated to showcasing "a collection of emerging talents that is the (dominant) force of art to come."

The show is the brainchild of Stefani Schrader, senior in women's studies and English literature.

Schrader said "Venus in Furs" is the second show she has organized. The first was Nov. 17 at Sisters of Sound in Aggieville.

The original show was a senior project for her women's studies major, Schrader said.

"I wanted to organize an all-women's art show for a long time, and my senior project gave me the opportunity to make myself get it done," Schrader said.

Schrader said she was interested in coordinating another art show in which pieces could be displayed for a longer period of time. The show at Varney's Gallery features eight artists, all of whom are either current K-State students or K-State alumnae, and contains about 20 pieces ranging from lithographs to photography to oil and acrylic paintings, Schrader said.

"I got access to the Varney's Gallery through James Taylor," Schrader said. "He oversees the gallery, and he was more than willing to help me put together this show."

Schrader said the show is important because it gives the women the opportunity and experience to show their art.

"Not a lot of undergraduates have the opportunity to show their work," Schrader said. "This show is a great way to see student work that is not just from senior projects, as well as being able to show pieces that might not otherwise have the chance to be displayed."

Schrader said she would like to see the show start a dialogue among artists in Manhattan.

"I would like to see student artists, especially women artists, get more support from their fellow students and the community," Schrader said.

"I would like to see the show expand."

Leah Cunick, K-State alumna and Manhattan resident, is one of the artists featured in "Venus in Furs."

Cunick said Schrader asked her to participate, and she was more than happy to submit two pieces of original work.

"For me, (displaying my work) motivates me to do more art," Cunick said. "It's nice to work and show with other female artists. I'm glad for the opportunity to show my art again — it gives me something to do besides just work. If I don't draw or paint, I just don't feel like myself."

There will be an opening reception for "Venus in Furs" from 5:30-7:30 p.m. Friday at Varney's Gallery.

'Signature win' over Texas could mean K-State men will dance in March K-State's David Hoskins guards Missouri's Stephon Hannah Wednesday evening at Bramlage Coliseum. Despite Hoskins efforts, Hannah went on to score 27 points while Hoskins scored 25 points for the Wildcats' win.

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Leave it to K-State coach Bob Huggins to make a complicated process seem simple.

While the "talking heads," as Huggins calls them, undoubtedly will break down ratings, strength of schedules and conference standings over the next month, Huggins offered his own formula for making the NCAA Tournament.

"I know this — if we keep winning we're going to get in," he said.

A win against No. 22 Texas would look awfully good on K-State's tournament résumé.

Though the Wildcats (winners of six straight) are 16-6 and 5-2 in the Big 12 Conference, they lack a signature win.

All of K-State's conference wins are against teams with losing conference records.

That could change Saturday in Austin, Texas, but it doesn't figure to come easy.

The Longhorns (16-5, 6-1) own the Big 12's longest home winning streak at 22 games. More importantly, they've got the conference's most productive player.

Freshman Kevin Durant, who averages conference-bests in points (25) and rebounds (11.6) per game, earned player of the week honors three times in the last four weeks and is coming off a 37-point, 23-rebound effort in a win against Texas Tech Wednesday. Durant scored 20 or more points in 18 games, including five 30-point games.

K-State, 4-4 on the road, wants to prove it is up to the challenge.

"People are talking, 'are we for real?' We definitely want to prove to them how for real we are," senior Akeem Wright said. "We've been waiting for these matchups. We've got a nice streak going into these games and we're just trying to keep it going."

With a win, K-State could move to as high as second place in the conference by the end of the week.

That could set up, of all things, a potential showdown with No. 6 Kansas for first place in the Big 12 when the teams play Feb. 7 in Lawrence.

But for now, the Wildcats will have to resist the urge to look east down Interstate 70. The first order of business is taking care of the Longhorns.

"We've got to lay it on the line," Huggins said. "The minute we don't do that, we're not very good. Our margin for error is not very great. We don't have somebody to bail us out with a great play."

That's not entirely true.

Senior Cartier Martin and junior David Hoskins stepped up big down the stretch for the Wildcats in their 80-73 win over Missouri Wednesday.

The pair combined for 47 points and 17 rebounds, made critical shots in crunch time and put the game away with late free throws.

"We feel as though we're an NCAA (Tournament) team. We just have to go out and show it every night," Wright said.

"As long as we go out and handle our business on the court and keep winning, there's no telling what this team can do."

Wildcats look to break slump against Longhorns this weekend

By Dayne Logan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Texas comes to town this weekend to take on a Wildcat team that finds itself in the middle of a rather sizeable slump.

K-State (15-6 overall, 3-5 Big 12 Conference) lost four of its last five and is having trouble finding a formula that works for an entire game.

"You can't take one possession off," junior Kimberly Dietz said of her team's recent lack of consistency.

Freshman Kari Kincaid echoed Dietz's sentiments.

"We just need to put two halves together," Kincaid said.

Putting two halves together has been something easier said than done for K-State.

Against Nebraska two weeks ago, the Wildcats came out flat on both ends of the court and trailed the Huskers by 24 at halftime. In the second half, K-State turned the game around and cut the lead to three, but was unable to complete the comeback.

Wednesday at Colorado the Wildcats had the opposite problem. After jumping out to a 17-point lead early in the second half, K-State proceeded to go the next 10 minutes without scoring and eventually fell to the Buffaloes 66-55.

"Defensively we began to sag off a little bit on the perimeter," coach Deb Patterson said. "(The sagging defense) initiated a little bit of a passive personality and that carried over offensively."

K-State will need to play with more drive Saturday if it is to stand any chance of knocking off a Longhorn team that, despite losing three of its last five, is actually playing well.

Texas (15-7, 4-4) is playing so well, in fact, it managed to hand ninth-ranked Oklahoma its second-straight loss Wednesday.

"If they haven't been playing the best basketball of any team in the country, they're as talented as any team," Patterson said of Texas. "The big win over Oklahoma last night indicates that they're starting to put things together."

Texas senior forward Tiffany

K-State's Shalee Lehning goes for a ball against a Kansas player at Bramlage Coliseum. The Cats play the University of Texas tomorrow at 4:30 p.m. at Bramlage.

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

Jackson ranks fourth in the Big 12 in both scoring and rebounding. She is averaging 18.4 points and 9.1 rebounds per game.

Patterson went as far as to call Jackson one of the top five players in the country.

"Tiffany's just a phenomenal talent," Patterson said. "I think the best you can do is work very, very hard as a team. Work as hard as you can to limit her touches. Work as hard as you can to make her shots some of the spectacular difficult ones that she can make."

Stopping Jackson and the Longhorns won't be easy, but a win this weekend might be just what the Wildcats need to turn their season around.

Quarterbacks' reputations, legacies hinge on Super Bowl outcome

In sports, there probably isn't a single position more overrated than that of quarterback.

Despite football being a team game, which is affected by 21 other players, the quarterback is lionized in victory and crucified in defeat.

Nevermind the fact he doesn't even play defense or special teams.

Nothing magnifies this fact more than the NFL's biggest stage.

After Super Bowl XLI on Sunday, fans' perception of Peyton Manning and Rex Grossman will change forever.

If Indianapolis wins, Manning finally shakes the label of being this generation's Dan Marino. Although he owns a career passer rating of 94.4, come playoff time, the only thing people want to talk about is a couple of bad games against New England.

On the other hand, if the Colts lose, it will be more proof that Manning can't win the big game; as if he controls everything that happens.

In truth, Manning can't be defined as an exceptional playoff quarterback or a choke artist. In 12 career playoff games, he's played his share of good and bad games (his career postseason record is 6-6).

In back-to-back playoff games against Denver and Kansas City in 2003, Manning was brilliant. He threw for 681 yards and eight touchdowns and the Colts never punted on their way to consecutive playoff victories.

That came to a screeching halt in the next game, a 24-14 loss to the Patriots in the AFC Championship Game. Manning threw four interceptions and couldn't get comfortable.

Despite Manning's unimpressive playoff stats this year (two touchdowns and six interceptions), people are beginning to look at him as a good quarterback because the Colts are winning. Once again, nevermind the reason the Colts are in the Super Bowl: their defense (which is giving up an average of 16 points a game in the playoffs).

On the flip side, if Chicago wins the Super Bowl, Rex Grossman goes from "the worst Super Bowl quarterback ever" to "the guy who came through when his team needed him most." The fans will call him clutch and the Bears will claim they never lost faith in him.

It's been an up-and-down year for Grossman. After finally starting a season healthy, the Bears hoped Grossman would turn into the next Jim McMahon (also known as the guy responsible for the "Super Bowl Shuffle").

After a few catastrophic games, everyone wanted backup Brian Griese.

You know things are bad when people call for the guy who spent a considerable amount of time either benched or injured.

Even though the defense bailed Grossman out several times this year, he also came up big when his team needed him. In weeks 14 and 15, Grossman offset the shortcomings of the defense and special teams with strong performances of his own.

Both these quarterbacks have their reputations riding on this one game.

Win, and they're legends; lose, they're choke artists.

The truth is football is a team game. If the line doesn't block, the receivers don't catch and the defense doesn't stop anyone, then it really doesn't matter what the quarterback does. He can't do it all by himself.

TRK | K-State track and field team gears up for Husker Invitational

Technique is everything in track, and this is the time of year it needs to be perfected.

Bergman

"I am cleaning up my technique," said senior Bryce Bergman, K-State pole-vaulter. "I just need to work on the top (of my attempt)." Bergman provisionally qualified for the NCAA Indoor Championship with a mark of 17-3/4 last weekend.

"Right now I am satisfied," Bergman said about how his season was going. "Basically, I am getting ready for the Big 12 (Conference) meet."

The track team is preparing for future events by returning this week to the Bob Devaney Sports Center in Lincoln, Neb., for the Seignie Husker Invitational.

Standout sophomore Scott Sellers will run in the 4x400-meter relay, which differs from his best event, the high jump.

"Everything that we do with him is to improve the high jump," coach Cliff Rovelto said.

Sellers automatically qualified for the indoor championship with a jump of 7-5 1/4, which he posted last weekend at the Dan DeHart Invitational in Albuquerque, N.M.

"This meet has always been competitive," Rovelto said. "Our team, historically, has competed well there."

Joining K-State at the meet are Nebraska and Kansas from the Big 12, along with Oregon, Tennessee, Texas-El Paso, Iowa, Washington State and Wyoming.

Senior Morgan Bonds will compete in the 600-yard run after winning the 800-meter run last weekend with a time of 2:12.21.

"I want to try to PR (personal record) in that and try to get the school record," Bonds said.

Senior Kaylene Wagner will not compete this weekend after winning five straight high jump events.

The women's team is ranked No. 12 in the nation by this week's Trackwire 25 poll.

TEN | K-State faces Wichita State, trio of talented freshmen

Although K-State swept Wichita

State last year in dual competition, things might turn out differently this year, thanks to the addition of three freshmen.

In last year's dual against WSU, K-State swept the Shockers 7-0. However, there were some lineup changes this year.

Wichita State added three talented freshmen, including last week's Missouri Valley Conference Player of the Week, Florentina Hanisch, who plays No. 2 singles. Against Nebraska, Hanisch defeated Diana Kuhl (4-6, 6-2, 1-0).

Lenore Lazarou and Stephanie Dalmacio also are new to the Shockers' lineup. Both have 2-0 records so far this season. One familiar face, Madina Rakhim, was ranked in the top-100 last fall.

Sophomore Katerina Kudlackova, who faced off against Ana Ines Exeni last year and defeated her 6-0, 6-4, said she can't wait to face the new competition.

"I'm excited to see Wichita State," she said. "They have some new players so they will probably be better than last year."

Wichita State is K-State's second-straight Missouri Valley opponent, and the Wildcats will look to take their 11th-straight victory over the Shockers.

Last weekend, K-State swept Drake 7-0 but fell one spot to No. 54 in the Intercollegiate Tennis Association poll. WSU is ranked No. 62 in the poll after defeating Big 12 Conference opponent Nebraska last weekend, 6-1.

Coach Steve Bietau said last year's results have an effect on this year's early rankings, but the team is not focused on the rankings.

"It's a waste of time to focus on the rankings right now," he said. "Our team played pretty cleanly last week and there weren't a lot of issues that came out of the match that would cause us to change our normal routine."

Last weekend, the team of Kudlackova and junior Olga Klimova defeated the Drake pairing of Veronika Leszayova and Sarah Plowman 8-2. Klimova said coming off a win and going against another opponent is exciting.

"It's another match," she said. "All of the matches that we play are for the team. I'm just looking forward to playing and I'm going to try to do my best and support the team so we can win another match. I'm always looking forward just to playing."

PEOPLE IN THE NEIGHBORHOOD

Student body president relates hobbies, goals

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Life changed for Lucas Maddy in spring 2006.

After receiving support from family and friends, Maddy, senior in agricultural technology management, decided to run for student body president at K-State.

He won the election along with his running mate, his younger sister, Katie.

Now, with one of the most recognizable names on campus, Maddy works daily with and for students.

He has met world-famous dignitaries and is in constant contact with students, faculty and community members. His life is not so normal anymore.

Q: What made you want to run for student body president?

A: I guess I felt indebted to the university.

I've received a great education, and I was active with a number of other things on campus and within my major, but not with student government.

Q: Do you feel there are any drawbacks to the job?

A: No social life. Any time you put yourself in a media spotlight, there's obviously good and bad you're going to have to take.

Shalee Lehning knows that if she misses a free throw, she's going to hear about it whether she had hit 50 before that, so you always have to take the good with the bad.

Q: How much responsibility does your job entail?

A: I serve on a number of committees.

I think last week I had 12 different committee meetings.

I am also the vice chair for the student advisory committee to the Kansas Board of Regents.

We advocate for students' right in the legislature.

Other than that, I take care of about 120 appointments to various committees, so it takes a lot of finding people who are willing to participate and then matching their skill and schedule with a committee where they could be beneficial.

Portrait by Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Q: Do you have time for a hobby?

A: My biggest hobby is that I play guitar, and I write music. Wade Bowan and West 84 or Cross Canadian Ragweed — most people refer to it as red dirt or Texas country, and I call mine Kansas country because we don't have red dirt, and I'm not from Texas.

Q: Tell me about the election process last year.

A: The biggest drawback was that there was enough down time in between the sprints of campaigning to allow a candidate not only to analyze but overanalyze every single move they made.

The struggle was throughout those three weeks of campaigning, you're constantly second guessing the whole time, "Did I really do the right thing?" when in all actuality, if you just sit and breathe and have a good time, it goes by so much better.

During the last week, I was able to do that, and that was a very enjoyable week.

Q: What is the best thing about K-State?

A: We continue to instill the original intention of this university. It is a land-grant university.

It's here for mechanics and agriculture, and we have been able to involve ... so many great career opportunities for people in arts and sciences or human ecology.

We're a top-notch university. We're a top-10 land-grant university, and for Kansas to have that is just incredible. I can't imagine being from anywhere or being proud to be from anywhere other than Kansas.

Q: What's next for you?

A: I was just accepted into (graduate) school here at K-State, and after I get my grad degree, I'm going to go to law school and get my law degree. Past that, I plan to practice law just long enough for me to get on the bench as a judge.

Q: What advice would you give to someone running for office this spring?

A: I would tell them to make their ultimate goal not to build a parking garage or not to build giant water slides from Waters to Burt Hall.

Not to get rid of the squirrels on campus and not to improve traffic congestion, but to leave the university in as good of, or better, situation than you brought it into.

Gala benefit to aid women's heart health

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Today is National Wear Red Day, a day to promote women's heart health awareness. It is part of National Heart Month.

According to the American Heart Association, American women are six times more likely to die from heart disease than from breast cancer, and heart disease kills more women over 65 than all cancers combined.

The "A Dress the Heart" committee is asking Manhattan to show its support for the cause.

Donations

Those who cannot attend the gala can donate by calling (785) 587-5462.

The third annual "A Dress the Heart" Gala is at 7 p.m. Saturday at the Holiday Inn at the corner of 17th Street and Anderson Avenue. The event is sponsored by the Mercy Regional Auxiliary and the Mercy Community Health Foundation.

"We are separate from the hospital, and our sole purpose is for fundraisers that benefit programs and needs of the hospital," said Margie Michal, the foundation coordinator.

The gala raised more than $148,000 over the past two years, and Michal said donations already reach about $60,000 for this year.

About 180 people are registered for the event, and Michal encouraged people to make reservations ahead of time. The dress code is described as "black-tie optional."

"Usually the women wear semi-formal, and there's a lot of red and black," Michal said. "It is not required to wear red, though."

The band "The Exceptions featuring Betti O," is performing at the event.

"Every donation makes a difference, whether small or large," said Lydia Huber, member of the committee and vice president of planning and development at Mercy Regional Hospital. "I think it's important for people to give what they have, and in the end they add up."

At the time the committee began, Mercy needed a catheterization laboratory to be able to further examine the heart. Through the Gala and other donations, the committee was able to make that happen.

"We also saw a need of awareness in the community," Michal said.

Huber said if people wear red today, they can help make a difference, too.

"It's just a good sign that people can show their support for awareness of heart disease and support our cardiac initiative here in Manhattan," Huber said. "To make sure we have the resources to take care of people with heart disease."

According to the AHA, 480,000 women die of cardiovascular disease annually. Smoking, high cholesterol, high blood pressure and high blood sugar are the main factors contributing to heart disease.

Hanna Logsdon, fifth-year student in family studies and human services, said she thinks it's important for students to show their support.

"I've always heard it's the number one killer of women, but people just don't know it," Logsdon said. "People need to be aware of it, so they can start taking care of themselves earlier."

School district to hire diversity coordinator

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 School District is adding a new position to help meet the standards of President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act and the needs of its students.

The Board of Education approved the addition of a diversity coordinator, and the district hopes to have the position filled by April 1, superintendent Bob Shannon said.

Dave Colburn, school board president, said the diversity coordinator will help improve the achievement of low-income and minority students by working on professional development with teachers and administrators and working with families.

"When I look around and see how many school districts are struggling with the achievement gap, I guess I see a lot of different things being tried and not a lot of success occurring," he said. "We're trying to do something fundamentally different so that we can try to bring some fundamental results."

Colburn said the goal stems from the school's legal mandate for the No Child Left Behind Act, which the president signed in 2001.

"There (is) a legal mandate and a philosophical mandate," he said. "Every school district in the nation faces this challenge."

Colburn said the coordinator also will work on diversity within the district, including diversifying the staff.

"Diversity is a constant theme," he said. "Part of this is helping all of our students work in a more diverse workplace be able to address those kinds of issues."

The district is working on a Safe Zone program modeled after a similar program at K-State.

He said the program involves training faculty and staff in the areas of diversity and placing Safe Zone signs on their doors so students know they can talk to the person about tough issues.

"They can go in and say what they need to say and there won't be retribution, and that person would help resolve the situation," Colburn said.

For several years, the district has had a diversity commission for several years consisting of volunteer participants from the community, school staff, administration and the Board of Education, Shannon said.

Last year, representatives from the commission made recommendations to the Board of Education. One was to hire a diversity coordinator.

"The person would be expected to work with administrators and teachers to identify and eliminate achievement gaps for subgroups within the student population," Shannon said.

He said the job of the coordinator also will include recruiting employees, establishing relationships with parents and families and tying the school district and community together.

Colburn said it has been a long process to decide on the details for the diversity coordinator position.

"This job has one of the longest, most detailed job descriptions of anybody in the district," he said.

One reason for this, Colburn said, is the lack of existing models for the position.

"I think there are things that are going to have to be worked out and worked through," he said.

David Griffin, co-chairman of the diversity commission and assistant dean of secondary education, said the position will be evaluated three years after its creation to measure its progress.

"I think it will affect students in a variety of ways," Griffin said. "I think it's a position that is very much needed, and I think it will have a positive impact on the entire school district."

Consumers face difficulties when trying to cancel services

By Sarah Rasmussen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In an age when people pay bills, play games, buy music and even read the newspaper online, there is one thing online service providers are making increasingly difficult to do: cancel.

Throughout the years, online services like AOL, MSN and Napster, among others, have made it difficult for users to cancel accounts. Some companies do provide online cancellation services, but others require consumers to personally call their customer service centers.

Vincent Ferrari became "consumer hero" of sorts in the past few months because of his recorded phone call with an AOL customer service representative in 2006. Many spoofs of his phone call have appeared on YouTube.com and MySpace.com, but the actual phone conversation is more serious.

On the tape, Ferrari asked John, the AOL representative, to cancel his account several times within a five-minute period before John began to process the cancel-

Tips for cancelling an online service

- Use speakerphone when you call.
- Take notes.
- Budget at least 30 minutes.
- Talk to a human.
- Don't be afraid to hang up and try another representative.
- Say exactly what you want.
- Don't think the world revolves around you.
- Let the representative talk.
- Be civil.
- Be reasonable and keep perspective.

lation.

In an interview with "The Today Show," Ferrari told host Matt Lauer he recorded the call because he had heard "horror stories" about how impossible it is to cancel online subscriptions.

"I knew it was going to prove a point either way," Ferrari told Lauer. "Either it would prove that it is as hard as people are saying, or it's not nearly that difficult and people are exaggerating."

Ferrari said he acknowledges businesses' desire to maintain their customer base, but consumers cannot be forced to continue a service they do not want.

"I understand that you have to try to retain your customers, because you exist on the existence of your customers," Ferrari told Lauer, "but there comes a point when you just have to give up."

Andrea Weber, senior in music education, has not tried to cancel an online subscription, but said she listened to Ferrari's recording.

"I didn't realize that it could be this difficult to cancel an account, and I would definitely be as annoyed as Ferrari in that situation," she said. "It makes me think twice before signing up for something that would be hard to get out of in the long run."

Manhattan resident Julianne Riche said she was frustrated by attempts to cancel her AOL service six years ago.

"They (AOL) still billed me for another five months after I had thought I had made clear that I didn't want it anymore," she said.

Funeral picketing bill introduced

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, Kan. (AP) - Kansas legislators again are trying to find a way to ban picketing at funerals of U.S. troops killed in combat, in response to protests in recent years throughout the nation by the Rev. Fred Phelps and his followers.

Last year, a funeral picketing bill died because the House and Senate couldn't agree on the best way to deal with what legislators agreed was an embarrassment to the state. Some worried that if the law was too restrictive, Phelps and his followers would win a lawsuit and get attorneys' fees, further financing their activities.

Under current state law, it is illegal to picket "before or after" a funeral service one hour before, during or two hours after the service starts.

The bill introduced Thursday bans protests within 300 feet of a funeral within one hour before, during and two hours following the start of the funeral. It also makes it unlawful to obstruct public streets or sidewalks while picketing. Violations would be a misdemeanor.

This year's version has a new wrinkle: The ban wouldn't be enforced until the Kansas Supreme Court rules that it's constitutional. The attorney general's office would be directed to file a lawsuit challenging the law.

"It's a way to test the constitutionality without running the risk of getting sued and losing the lawsuit," said Senate Majority Leader Derek Schmidt, who introduced the bill along with 36 co-sponsors in the 40-member chamber.

PROTEST | Activists to demonstrate against wage issues, evidence needed for probable cause warmer, so more people should attend." Cage said one person the group would like to reach is Gov. Kathleen Sebelius. "This is the only time the governor's coming to Manhattan," he said. "No governor wants to be ashamed or embarrassed. If they show the protest outside of Manhattan, then it puts more resolve behind her." However, Casey Scott, associate athletic director of operations, said the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics has not yet received confirmation that Sebelius will be at the game. "It's not to say she won't be there," he said. "She does attend some events, but we have not been notified she won't be there that night." Scott also said it is unlikely the protesters will get coverage from ESPN. "They're not going to go out and give coverage to a local issue," Scott said. In his six years at K-State, Scott said he has never seen protesters at an athletic event. "We have had protesters prior to a Landon Lecture or an event of a national scope," he said "But not an athletic event." Even with the protesters, Cage said there should not be a problem for people who are walking to the game. "If it was large enough in terms of the number of protesters, we would work with them to go to the area of where they can protest," Scott said. This will not be Cage's only protest this year. He said he plans to protest against U.S. currency on March 21 at the state capitol in Topeka, because blacks, native Americans and women aren't represented. "The currency needs to reflect the people of the nation," he said. There have been coins with Susan B. Anthony and Sacagawea, but he said one year of currency is not enough. "Why not have a permanent currency?" he said. He will also protest pregnant women smoking sometime this year.

Protestors' proposals

- Issue 1
Students will protest the two-week waiting period many jobs enforce on employees before they can receive a paycheck. The two-week waiting period often makes it so employees don't receive a paycheck for a month.
Solution:
■ Hold the first week's paycheck so the employees could get paid after their second week.
■ Employees could pay a safety deposit for the equipment or uniform issued to them so the employer would have no reason to hold the paycheck.
■ Employer could take fees owed to them from the first paycheck or paychecks.
- Issue 2
The pay card system enforced by some jobs charges employees to use their paychecks put on the card by their employer.
Solution:
■ All employers offer employees a hard check option or direct deposit as payment options.
- Issue 3
The minimum wage should be raised to the federal minimum wage standard for all jobs in Kansas. The protesters do not want employees in Kansas to be punished by their

- employers for receiving tips or gratitude for a job well done. They want to stop employers from offering discounts on merchandise for the compensation of pay. They also want to stop employees' paychecks from being based solely on sales.
- Solution:
■ The State of Kansas could raise the state minimum wage to the federal minimum wage and make the minimum wage inclusive for all employees of Kansas.
- Issue 4
Law enforcement officials can write tickets without any evidence of crime. They are elevated by the state to a position where their word is enough to inflict financial trauma.
Solution:
■ The law enforcement officer should modify the traffic cameras on street lights to be portable because they take a picture, a date, and a time of the traffic violation. If law enforcement officials had this technology along with a printer, they could store a receipt on their computer or in their car in case they had to appear in court. This could eliminate some driver's beliefs of being persecuted by state officials.

GROUNDHOG DAY | Punxsutawney Phil makes forecast

Groundhog Day celebration began on Jan. 26th, and today, the 121st celebration will begin at 3 a.m., Eastern Standard Time, according to punxsutawneyphil.com. The official prediction will occur at daybreak, which is approximately 7:25 a.m., the Web site states. Other events planned for the day are weather center exhibits, a groundhog pancake breakfast, and Phil's wedding chapel, which allows people to marry in a ceremony performed by the mayor of Punxsutawney. The probability of Punxsutawney Phil remaining above ground with cameras and flashbulbs going off isn't too great, Springstead said. "I don't think I'd stick around if it were me," she said.

Manhattan feels effect of California freeze

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan is feeling the effects of a freeze that occurred more than 1,500 miles away. Nearly $1 billion of damage to produce, such as oranges, lemons and lettuce, is estimated in California after what many call the worst crop freeze of the decade. Many fruit and vegetable vendors in Manhattan are suffering the consequences of this freeze. Audrey Clowers, assistant manager at People's Grocery, said her fruit contact warned her the next few months might be rough in the fruit market. "Most of our product comes out of California, but some comes from out of the country as well," Clowers said. "The impact of the freeze will be felt over the next couple of months, maybe into April or May." Citrus fruits like oranges and lemons were hit worst. Clowers was lucky enough to stock up on lemons before the bad weather struck, but said citrus fruits bought now definitely will have a price increase for customers. "I would say the price of lemons would increase the most," she said. "The price on those has probably almost doubled." Manhattan resident Mary Malone said she noticed a price increase in fruits, such as oranges, and if the price continues to rise, she might stop buying fresh fruit. "I've heard that the prices of oranges and avocados are going to be unreachable," Malone said. "I think we might be going to canned fruit instead." The amount of damage will not be known until farmers begin to harvest again and they learn what part of their crops was injured. "The damage to the vegetable crops or things like strawberries or lettuce aren't as bad," said Mary Knapp, climatologist in the Department of Agronomy. "They might lose one harvest, but then they can go back and start again. Tree damage will take longer for the orchard to recover from, though." The cold temperatures in Kansas have not had the same affect on Kansas crops, but unfortunately, Kansas is not the ideal place for growing the fruits and vegetables injured in California, she said. "We can grow a wide variety of fruits, but they're not usually grown for commercial consumption," said Ward Upham, research and extension associate in horticulture. "The head of lettuce is hard for us to grow because our temperature gets too hot too quickly." For now, local groceries will need to turn to other sources to meet all their fruit needs. "I just got some grapefruit in from the Texas area," Clowers said. "And they don't look near as good."

Iranian president defiant in promises to push ahead with nuclear program

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TEHRAN, Iran — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad launched anniversary celebrations Thursday for Iran's Islamic Revolution with a defiant promise to push ahead with the country's controversial nuclear program. Ahmadinejad suggested Tehran would announce next week that it is beginning to install a new assembly of 3,000 centrifuges in an underground portion of its uranium enrichment facility at Natanz that the U.S. has warned could bring further sanctions against the country. The Iranian leader said his government is determined to continue with its nuclear program, despite U.N. Security Council sanctions imposed over its refusal to halt uranium enrichment, a process that can produce fuel to generate electricity or for the fissile core of an atomic bomb. Kicking off 10 days of celebrations to mark the 28th anniversary of the 1979 Islamic revolution that brought hard-line clerics to power, Ahmadinejad said Iran will celebrate next week "the stabilization and the establishment of its full right" to enrich uranium at the facility. The chief of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, said last week that he expected Iran to announce "they are going to build up their 3,000 centrifuge facility" in February. There had been speculation the announcement could come during the revolution anniversary. U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said Iran would face "universal international opposition" over the step.

University of Kansas, Missouri Health System take steps toward cross-state collaboration

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Officials with the University of Kansas Medical Center, the University of Kansas Hospital and the St. Luke's Health System in Missouri have signed letters of intent to affiliate for teaching and research purposes. Irvine Hockaday Jr., chairman of the Kansas City Area Life Sciences Institute, announced the agreements Thursday during an economic development summit featuring Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius and Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt in Kansas City.

He said the letters were signed late Wednesday and would go before the hospitals' boards of directors for approval later this month. Hockaday said representatives for KU Med and the university hospital, located on the same campus in Kansas City, Kan., but separate entities since 1998, still must resolve some issues, but he expected a final agreement to be ironed out by March 31. "To let parochial interests ... supersede this regional opportunity would undermine and destroy the purpose and hope of this conference," Hockaday said to applause from the audience of state and business leaders. Later, Sebelius and Blunt voiced their support for the plan, which is designed to help strengthen Kansas City's drive to attract bioscience research and industry. "I'm very much convinced that this is a great step forward," she said. The University of Kansas hospital is currently the university system's main teaching hospital, while KU Med is the system's lead research and teaching arm. Under the affiliation agreement, medical students would also work at St. Luke's hospitals. Kansas House Speaker Melvin Neufeld, R-Ingalls, on Thursday repeated calls for the Legislature to have a voice on the issue. He said he didn't feel there had been enough public input into the plan, and "I don't see any benefit to Kansas in this." "I'm not opposed to expanding research. This agreement isn't about research," Neufeld said. "It's about siphoning out interns from Kansas to St. Luke's so that St. Luke's can expand their market share and gain a competitive edge against the leading hospital in Kansas City, which is the University of Kansas Hospital." Dr. Mark McPhee, St. Luke's chief operating officer, said in a written statement Thursday that his hospital wanted to help improve medical research in the region and said the agreement would help increase recruitment of medical students. "Saint Luke's is pleased to become the superior form of glue that may bond our medical community together, with the goal of helping Kansas City better serve patients through life sciences initiatives — medical research and medical education," McPhee said.

Twining tradition

Bouquet design and arrangement becoming less about tradition, more about personal style

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Throughout the years, the wedding bouquet has evolved in arrangement and color.

Karen Medlin, owner of Westloop Floral, has been in the flower business for more than 25 years. Medlin said the bouquet is based on what the wedding party prefers.

"Many things have come along that have changed bouquets," she said. "But the most important change has been peoples' tastes and what they want in their bouquet."

Wiring and taping bouquets often are used to create the perfect arrangement, Medlin said.

"When we first started, everything was wired and taped," she said. "This didn't allow the arrangements to last very long because they had no water source."

However, the introduction of oasis, a floral sponge, increased the shelf life of bouquets, Medlin said.

The most popular bouquet Medlin makes is called a hand-tied bouquet. The stems of the flowers are tied together, creating a handle and a place for the flowers to be placed in a vase. This method also leaves the natural stems visible.

The colors of flowers also have changed with time, Medlin said.

"Brides used to carry mostly or all-white bouquets, and these days it depends on the color of the wedding," she said.

When choosing wedding flowers, Emily Sisk, senior in secondary education, said she decided to stay away from the all-white bouquet. Instead, the primary color for Sisk's bouquet is orange with deep red, purple and dark gold accents.

"We really wanted a rustic look," she said.

Lori Wadell, junior in biology, said she chose white for her wedding bouquet.

"White is a very classic color, and my fiancé and I decided that we wanted to go with the all-white look."

They plan a May 12, 2007 wedding in Kearney, Neb.

Create easy corsages, bouttonnières with simple instructions

How to make a fresh flower corsage

■ Use odd numbers for your flowers. You want one, three or five flowers in your corsage.

■ Gather your flowers together and tape stem wrap around the stems. Floral tape or stem wrap comes in green and white.

■ Add your baby's breath, gypsophila, tiny forget-me-nots or whatever filler you have chosen. These should be placed sparingly between the flowers.

■ Place your corsage leaves over the stems below the flowers. Wrap it all together with floral tape. Trim the flowers' stems if you need to. Add your ribbon bow. Wrap the stems in ribbon if you want, and put a corsage pin into the stems to use later.

How to make a boutonniere

■ Cut stems to six inches long. Arrange flowers on a bed of leaves.

■ Secure stems together with thin floral wire.

■ Place green tape at top of stems underneath the flowers and stretch the tape as you twist it around the stems. It will stick to itself.

How to pin a corsage

■ A corsage should gently bend over the collar bone. Do not pin too far down. The wearer should be able to turn her head slightly and be able to smell the corsage.

Bright dresses in style for spring

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bright colors are the trend for those having weddings this spring.

Some popular colors for bridesmaids dresses include fuchsia and turquoise, said Katie Martinez, bridal consultant at Livingston's Tuxedo and Bridal Gallery in Topeka.

Bridesmaids who order dresses from Livingston's tend to get tea-length dresses, which fall to about mid-calf, Martinez said.

"We've also gotten a lot of dresses in taffeta material," she said. "I would also say there are a lot of sashes."

Tylie McFarlane, senior in early childhood education, said her bridesmaids each will wear a strapless, tea-length, two-piece dress with a sash around the waist.

The colors for her May wedding to Daniel Mahoney, senior in mechanical and nuclear engineering, are coral and champagne.

Most bridesmaids wear the sashes around the waist, Martinez said. The average cost for these dresses is from $160 to $200.

Brittney Minson, senior in marketing, is planning a May wedding to her fiancé, Robert Nelson, senior in architectural engineering.

She said she is planning to have white and gold as her colors, not because they're trendy, but because she likes them.

"I wanted it to look pretty," she said.

Her bridesmaids will wear long, satin-and-gold dresses with a spaghetti strap.

As far as the wedding dresses, Martinez said a lot of women like to put color in them.

"Some try to match their bridesmaids," she said. "A lot of girls choose red."

When choosing the dress style, Martinez said women are choosing dresses with a pickup skirt.

"It's kind of like where they take the skirt and pull it up into a pucker look or they'll tuck it under," she said. "They'll basically bunch it up."

Brides who buy their dresses at Weisner's Sew Unique and Bridal Boutique, 314 Poyntz Ave., usually get bridal ruche, Amanda Schletel, bridal consultant, said.

"They've been popular for a while now."

Tips for a spring wedding

■ Use chocolate bunnies or eggs as favors for a wedding near Easter.

■ Use brightly colored tulips or lilies because flowers are more abundant.

■ Give guests flower seeds so they can always remember the wedding.

■ Use flower-shaped candles.

■ Sprinkle rose petals on wedding cake or table. Silk or real petals work.

■ Choose pink, yellow or blue for the colors. Pastels work the best.

■ Have fresh fruit for guests.

■ Release butterflies instead of rice or bubbles.

■ Have a cocktail outside.

Wedding reminders, updates important

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Here are a few wedding tips, thanks to Martha Stewart and her list of "Good Things."

SAVE-THE-DATE STICKERS

Guests are sure to remember your wedding day if all they have to do is peel and stick a reminder to their calendars.

You can personalize adhesive labels at home.

Buy one-inch round labels from an office-supply store, and follow the manufacturer's instructions to download and customize the template.

Print labels with your date using a laser printer. Cut each sheet into rows of labels. Laser print note cards with a message to "save the date." Affix a row of labels to each note card with a glue stick.

SAVE-THE-DATE MAGNET

You'll never forget your own wedding date, but it doesn't hurt to provide your guests with a hard-to-lose reminder.

Begin with an image that you consider emblematic of your wedding; we used a postcard of a chapel.

Enlarge or reduce the image on a color photocopier to the size of pre-cut adhesive-backed sheet magnets, leaving room for the details.

Affix slips of paper bearing your names and the wedding date to the image to create a template of the finished product. Using a color photocopier, produce as many copies as you will need, and trim to size. Glue each label to a magnet, and mail.

BRIDAL PARTY SNACK BOX

Wedding days can be long, especially for the attendants who are with the bride every step of the way.

Having some snacks close by will ensure that the bridal party has enough energy to make it to the last dance.

Line flip-top kraft-paper boxes with natural parchment, and fill them with finger foods such as pretzels, crudites, small sandwiches and dried fruits.

BRIDESMAIDS' UPDATE

Bridesmaids — an important part of a wedding as well as of the bride's life — should be put in touch with each other early and then kept abreast of all the wedding plans as they develop.

Send out a letter complete with all the fine points they will need to know: begin by listing the names, addresses, and phone numbers of all the bridesmaids (they will be thankful when it comes time to plan the shower).

Also include a photograph of the bridesmaid dress, a swatch of the fabric, any information about fittings and a photo or sketch of the bridesmaid shoes.

Finally, a few fond words from the bride will make them feel special — as all bridesmaids should.

—www.marthastewart.com

Bridesmaids can enjoy wedding day, too

I would like to start today by stating that I have never been a bridesmaid.

I have been in two weddings and attended one other. The first wedding I ever attended was my uncle's.

The next was my cousin's wedding, and I had to miss prom to be at that one. I know I'm still upset about that one. The other wedding I was in was my roommate's, and I was an usher.

I explain all of this to let you know I basically am an expert at this point. I have seen the facets of the wedding game, and I understand that after the bride, groom and parents, most of the remaining stress falls on the attendants.

The bridesmaids and groomsmen are the interns of the wedding, preparing for their own big days and doing the work no one else wants to do.

It gets tough to deal with — the errands, combined with the average time crunch, long hours and the bride and her mother accusing you of sabotage when you forget to order a latte with no cream.

This is where I come in. Below is a list of ways you can relieve some stress for your friend's big day.

ERIC DAVIS

■ Form an alliance with the best-looking member of the groom's party (only for the single ladies) It is easier to deal with things when they are shared between friends. It is always nice to have someone you can call after a long day of internship. Also, you can make out with him. We have all done it. It relieves stress.

■ Take your time

Almost all accidents happen when people involved are in a rush. If you take more time to accomplish something, you can ensure it is done right and can rest easy knowing you did a good job.

■ Eat

When most people are stressed, they don't eat or drink water. This is a bad idea. Not only does food fill you up when you are hungry, it provides your overworked brain with fuel so you can concentrate on helping the bride look her best when the wedding bells chime. You also will need all of the energy you can muster when the groomsmen from the aforementioned alliance asks you to dance.

■ Sleep

This might be more important than the alliance. The brain works best when it has had time to rest. Also, if things go well after tip number one, a session of light cuddling might be in order. I love to cuddle, and it helps me relax.

■ Exercise

I don't mean exercise in the physical sense, which is hard to do even when your schedule is clear. I mean exercise your brain and keep it busy.

The K-State Collegian has a quaint puzzle section on page 2 that just might do the trick. This is also a good time to get some QT with that special someone — or the guy you have been using since step one.

■ Drink heavily

It's called a wedding party — not a wedding funeral.

The only way to really enjoy yourself at one of these things is to drink a lot and then do something embarrassing, like giving a toast, for example. I recommend something like this:

Best man: Is there anyone who would like to give a toast this evening?

Drunken bridesmaid: I will (stumbles up to the microphone and takes it from the best man).

I would just like to say that even though when I was dating (name of groom), he was a total jerk to me, from what I can tell he treats (bride's name) well.

Just watch out because he has really bad morning breath. Here's to the rest of their lives.

(Of course, some slight improvisation is called for here, but you get the idea.)

As I said earlier, I am an expert when it comes to these things.

Weddings are hectic at the best of times and to really make the event special, it takes a quality, well-managed team of interns, caterers and mothers.

I also recognize none of these patented, time-tested tips will ever make it into the pages of a self-help magazine.

But they work. Strictly adhering to these rules will help any day go off without a hitch.

FOR ADULTS

Spanish movie 'Pan's Labyrinth' garners Oscar nod with surreal imagery

"Pan's Labyrinth"

★★★★★

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

For some moviegoers, the idea of watching a film in another language might not be appealing.

While standing in line for "Pan's Labyrinth," I heard numerous comments from film fans who don't seem to embrace the idea that you don't need to speak English to be a great storyteller.

While I can understand why a lazy entertainment consumer would want to avoid reading subtitles when intellect-free films such as "Epic Movie" can be viewed without inconveniencing a couple of brain cells, it would be a serious error to avoid "Pan's Labyrinth" because of a perceived language barrier.

The film is an incredible mixture of unsettling fantasy and disturbing military drama that shouldn't have been left out of the Academy Awards' best picture race.

While director Guillermo Del Toro is no stranger to the American film industry, it would be a stretch to call him a household name. His previous films include "Mimic," a decent horror film; "Blade II," a comic book-based sequel filled with R-rated eye candy that lacked the intriguing vampire mythology and characterization that made its predecessor worthwhile; and "Hellboy," another comic book-based film that was a welcome surprise in a largely mediocre genre. He also directed a Spanish language film, "The Devil's Backbone," in 2001. Despite critical acclaim it went largely unnoticed by American audiences.

Del Toro's previous efforts prove that he's a competent director, but the emotional and imaginative prowess he displays in "Pan's Labyrinth" probably is this year's most welcome surprise.

"Pan's Labyrinth" is the story of Ofelia, a young girl who travels with her pregnant mother to live with her new stepfather. Set in rural northern Spain in 1944, post-war Fascist repression is at its height and Ofelia must come to terms with that through a fable of her own.

That takes care of the primary plot, but the real gold is in the fantasy subplot that unfolds as Ofelia struggles to survive her situation. After a fairy leads her to a cave inhabited by Pan, a faun who guards a portal to the underworld, Ofelia must complete three tasks to prove that she's actually the reincarnated soul of a princess.

It might sound like children's film, but nothing could be further from the truth. Ofelia's stepfather, Captain Vidal (Sergi Lopez), rules the town with an iron fist. He doesn't hesitate to torture and kill anyone who's sympathetic toward the communist guerillas in the surrounding forest, and his performance is far more terrifying and unsettling than anything Hollywood has shoved at us in recent years.

The film is rigorously intense from the first frame to the last, and the brilliant cinematography and imaginative costume design round out an entirely fulfilling cinematic achievement.

Any worries about language barriers should disappear within the first few minutes. If you let a simple thing such as subtitles ruin a movie that deserves every bit of praise it receives, your tastes probably should be re-evaluated.

With any luck, Del Toro's critical and commercial success will continue far beyond next year's "Hellboy 2: The Golden Army." Not only is "Pan's Labyrinth" Guillermo Del Toro's best film to date, it's possibly the best film released this year.

Mexican directors

After announcing the nominee roster for the 79th annual Academy Awards, presenter Salma Hayek exclaimed, "There's so many Mexicans!" This year marks an unexpected surge in the prominence of Mexican filmmakers. This year's success prompted Mexico's congress to approve a bill allowing tax breaks for companies that invest in Mexican cinema in an effort to boost film production. The directors of three of this year's most acclaimed films all hail from Mexico City.

'Walk it out' DJ to perform in Manhattan

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Changing up the concert scene in Manhattan, DJ Unk will perform live at 7 p.m. Saturday in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

DJ Unk gained national attention by earning a spot in the Billboard Top 40 and introducing another hip-hop dance craze with his debut single, "Walk it Out."

Daniel "Dank" Martin, founder of TreyStar Entertainment, arranged for DJ Unk to stop in Manhattan on his spring tour.

Dank and Josh Criswell, junior in American ethnic studies, worked together to bring DJ Unk to K-State.

Dank interned at Swisher-house records, best known for acts like Mike Jones and Paul Wall before moving to Kansas.

"I wanted to use those connections in the industry to bring some hip-hop flavor to Kansas," he said.

Dank said he noticed Lawrence was hosting many headliner music artists and had a more hip-hop friendly atmosphere. He said he wants K-State to rival the Kansas in entertainment, and he is working on a K-State vs. KU greek community stomp show.

"It will be called 'Stomp the Yard, 1-70 S series,'" he said.

Criswell's cousin Ace, an Atlantic recording artist, is the opening act.

Following Ace will be a greek step show, showcasing Omega Psi Phi and historically black sororities Delta Sigma Theta and Zeta Phi Beta. Following the step show DJ Unk will a "Walk it Out" contest where the winner will be awarded $150.

After the contest, DJ Unk will take the stage.

"I think the Midwest is an open market," Criswell said. "Dank really took the initiative to enrich the K-State community."

Tickets for Saturday's performance will be for sale in advance for $25 at Varney's, The K-State Store and Silverado Saloon. Tickets can be purchased for $30 at the door.

Fans can receive pictures and autographs with DJ Unk at a meet-and-greet from 5-6 p.m. at Manhattan Town Center.

Police report stolen vehicle, arson attempt

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department reported the recovery of a vehicle stolen Jan. 16 from Ed Bozarth Chevrolet, 3731 S. Topeka Blvd., Topeka, RCPD Lt. Michael Quintanar said.

A 1999 Chevrolet Silverado 2500 4x4 extended cab was discovered in the Ag Press parking lot, 1531 Yuma St., Jan. 26, Quintanar said.

Someone had attempted to set fire to the vehicle, using an ignition mechanism created with gasoline in a bottle, he said.

"It looks like it snuffed itself out," he said.

The owners of Ag Press called to have the vehicle towed after it had remained in the parking lot for several days, and when the RCPD arrived, they discovered it had been stolen from Topeka, Quintanar said.

"What was thought to be window tint was actually soot," he said.

Total loss was $11,500.

Jazz orchestra gives interactive performance

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Associate Provost Alfred Cochran could barely contain his excitement when talking about the Vanguard Jazz Orchestra performance Saturday night at McCain Auditorium.

Playing a CD of Jim McNeely's music, he swayed and tapped his foot, closing his eyes as he listened.

McNeely was the resident composer and pianist that night.

Cochran spoke in McCain 204 before the concert to about 11 people, explaining what they would hear that night and how it differed from music played at other jazz concerts.

McNeely's "Up From the Skies," was more of an audience participation type of music, as opposed to music that just washes over the audience, Cochran said.

The title of the album, as well as the first track, was taken from a Jimi Hendrix tune, he said.

Playing several tracks from the album, Cochran spoke of the stratification of elements in the music, as well as the need for the audience to participate in listening.

"You really need to hook onto it," he said.

The Vanguard Jazz Orchestra began under the name the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra in 1966, according to the band's Web site.

After the death of Lewis in 1990, the band continued as a cooperative effort, the site states.

The band has been nominated for two Grammy awards, one for best large jazz ensemble and the other for best arrangement for "Up From the Skies."

1st road victory over ranked team in 10 years puts K-State 2nd in Big 12

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

AUSTIN, Texas — Upsetting No. 22 Texas, 73-72, gave K-State a "signature win" to impress the NCAA Tournament selection committee, but it also gave the Wildcats something else: a legitimate shot at the Big 12 Conference Championship.

The win tied K-State (17-6, 6-2 Big 12) for second place in the Big 12 with Kansas and Texas. A win against the Jayhawks on Wednesday and the Wildcats will trail only Texas A&M in conference standings.

After knocking down a season-high 14 3-pointers Saturday at the Erwin Center, K-State made Texas coach Rick Barnes a believer.

"Definitely, they're an NCAA (Tournament) team," Barnes said. "There's a lot of basketball left to play, and they're in position. They're going to obviously win a bunch more games."

Senior Cartier Martin led the Wildcats down the stretch, scoring 20 of his 27 points in the second half. He connected on 7-of-11 3-pointers and sank three in the final four minutes.

With 51 seconds remaining, K-State called a timeout with the game tied 68-68. Martin reminded coach Bob Huggins that he wanted the ball.

"I let him know I was feeling it," Martin said.

Huggins drew up a play that called on junior David Hoskins to drive the ball inside and then pass it back out to Martin, who was wide open at the 3-point line. He drilled the 3-pointer and put the Wildcats up for good.

While Martin did his damage in the second half, senior Lance Harris kept the game close in the first half. Harris scored 16 first-half points and converted 4-of-5 3-pointers.

"I was shooting in a rhythm," Harris said. "Nobody was really making shots in the first half, so I just had to put my team on my back and try to knock in shots."

The efforts of Martin and Harris helped offset Texas freshman Kevin Durant's huge game. Durant scored 32 and grabbed nine rebounds.

The 32 points gave Durant his third-straight 30-point game. He scored 34 against Baylor Jan. 27 and 37 against Texas Tech on Wednesday.

During a five-second span in the second half, Durant blocked three shots from junior Clint Stewart. He finished the game with five blocks.

"The main focus was to cover Durant and not let him get going," Martin said. "He ended up getting his, but it takes a team to win a game."

While Durant posted another dominant performance, his supporting cast struggled. Only one other Longhorn, freshman Justin Mason, scored in double figures (he finished with 12 points).

K-State held Texas sophomore A.J. Abrams to seven points on 2-of-16 shooting.

Martin's 27 led the Wildcats in scoring. Harris finished with 19, and Hoskins scored 13.

Prior to Saturday's game, K-State had lost 29-straight road games against ranked opponents. The last win was in 1996 when the Wildcats beat then-No. 23 Iowa State, 92-87.

Simulation teaches ROTC cadets communication

Isaías Andaverde, training facilitator, talks to K-State ROTC cadets Saturday morning at Fort Riley's Close Combat Tactical Training center. The cadets took part in a simulated tactical mission using tanks and Bradley-fighting vehicle simulators.

Every soldier's head was on a swivel, watching the terrain and searching for first contact.

Far in the distance of the bright sand at Fort Carson, Calif., a gunner bellowed out, "Along the ridge-line at 10 o'clock," but only seconds later, the radio operator informed the group, "Red three gunner down." Among the confusion and billowing black smoke, one thing was sure: these were not your average Saturday morning video games.

Early Saturday morning, K-State's ROTC visited Fort Riley's close combat tactical training center to perform a simulated tactical mission using tank and Bradley fighting vehicle simulators.

"Inside of the simulators, it's pretty tight, pretty warm and has limited view in certain angles," said Leah Marietta, junior in kinesiology.

Inside of the training center, bright light adorns 30 simulators. However, the insides of these boxes contain some of the most advanced training technology in the world.

"These are designed to be exact replicas," said Mark Naughton, training facilitator for the Close Combat Tactical Training at Fort Riley. They are just as cramped, have the same color, and they even fail like they're supposed to. This is about as close as

DOGS TO HAVE THEIR DAY IN MEDITERRANEAN

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Dogs are to get a beach of their own on the sun-kissed Mediterranean island of Cyprus.

Dogs are strictly prohibited from the holiday island's shoreline to keep the beaches clean, but Cypriot authorities have decided enough of the dog's life.

They are looking for suitable beaches where people and their pets can enjoy the sun and sea without falling foul of other beachgoers.

The Ombudsman, a commissioner usually tasked with upholding human rights, recommended to authorities last year that dogs should get their own bathing space, the daily Phileleftheros reported.

'BUZZ DONUT' OFFERS SWEET CAFFEINE FIX

RALEIGH, N.C. — Robert Bohannon wants you in his world. It's fast, upbeat, jovial and driven by caffeine.

The molecular scientist, who moonlights as a café owner, developed a way to add caffeine to baked goods — one that eliminates the natural, bitter taste of caffeine.

"This gives people the opportunity if they want to have a glass of milk and want to have caffeine. It will get them going," said Bohannon.

The amount of caffeine in his creations can vary, but Bohannon easily can put 100 milligrams of caffeine — the equivalent of a 5-ounce cup of drip-brewed coffee — into the treats he plans to market under the "Buzz Donuts" and "Buzzed Bagels" names.

Bohannon, who owns Sips Coffee & Tea Café in Durham, N.C., isn't selling yet.

He recently began seeking patients and shopping the products to companies including Krispy Kreme Doughnuts Inc., Dunkin' Donuts and Starbucks Corp. There's no word yet on whether the companies like the idea.

But with waistlines and anxiety already expanding across the nation, some observers already question whether it's wise to combine two key sources of these problems — caffeine and calories.

WAR VET, 84, WINS $254 MILLION LOTTERY

CHICAGO — An 84-year-old retired electrician from Missouri has won $254 million in the Powerball lottery, lottery officials announced on Monday.

James Wilson, a World War II veteran from St. Louis, bought the winning ticket for the multi-state lottery about an hour before the drawing on Jan. 24, officials said in a statement.

The state lottery said it was the 10th-biggest jackpot in the world ever won on a single ticket.

Wilson and his wife, Shirley, 79, have three grown sons: James, 59; William, 54; and Terril, 53, all of St. Louis, and the family for years has bought the tickets with an agreement to share the winnings, the announcement said.

"We all buy family Powerball tickets, but mom and dad only buy tickets when the jackpot gets high," said Terril. "I think this is the first one he's bought in the last six months. This ticket only cost us $1 each, which we were happy to pay."

OVERLY AMBITIOUS EAGLE KNOCKS OUT POWER

JUNEAU, Alaska — About 10,000 Juneau residents briefly lost power after a bald eagle lugging a deer head crashed into transmission lines.

"You have to live in Alaska to have this kind of outage scenario," said Gayle Wood, an Alaska

Electric Light & Power spokeswoman. "This is the story of the overly ambitious eagle who evidently found a deer head in the landfill."

The bird, weighed down by the deer, apparently failed to clear the transmission lines, she said.

A repair crew found the eagle dead, the deer head nearby.

The power was out for less than 45 minutes Sunday.

OVERZEALOUS CENSOR EDITS 'GOD' OUT OF MOVIE

ATLANTA — So much for God and country, at least during some in-flight showings of the Oscar-nominated movie "The Queen."

All mentions of God were bleeped out in a version of the film given to some commercial airlines.

Even in these politically correct times, censoring references to God in the film was not a statement. Rather, it was the mistake of an overzealous and inexperienced employee for a California company that edits movies selected for onboard entertainment.

The censor was told to edit out all profanities — including any blasphemy — for the version of the movie distributed to Atlanta-based Delta Air Lines, Air New Zealand and other carriers.

In-flight viewers of the film at one point heard "Bleep" bless you, ma'am," as one character spoke to the queen. In all, the word "God" is bleeped seven times in the version.

"The Queen" depicts the reactions of British monarch Elizabeth II and Prime Minister Tony Blair in the week following Princess Diana's death in 1997.

The editor responsible for the mistake is still working in the editing laboratory of the California-based company, Klein said.

Beach Museum provides area youth taste of art

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 40 children stumbled into the Beach Museum of Art on Friday morning, chattering loudly and pointing at pieces of art.

Third- and fourth-grade students from Westmoreland Elementary School in Westmoreland, Kan., visited the art museum's Creative Place Gallery, cosponsored by Target.

The students spent their time at the art museum writing poetry and learning how artists use perspective in their work.

Katherine Schlageck, education coordinator of the museum, greeted the students on the first floor of the museum.

"We're going to think of some 100-dollar words today," she told the children.

Schlageck led one group of students to a line of pictures on the museum's second floor, explaining how artists use linear and atmospheric perspective to create depth in their artwork.

"I love this kind of stuff," one girl said at the front of the group, pointing at an example of atmospheric perspective.

After discussing the types of perspective, students hurried to find seats lined at the wall to begin drawing pictures using perspective with crayons and watercolor pencils.

Veronica Valburg, 9, said she would begin by drawing waterfalls between two rocks.

Sitting beside her, Blair Campbell, 10, said she was going to draw waterfalls as well with a pool of water in the background.

"Now I'm ready for drawing," Campbell said after describing her idea and picking up a colored pencil. "We do a lot of coloring in the fourth grade."

Hills and mountains covered the page of Rachel Cafrey, 9.

"I want to do mine like the Rocky Mountains," she said.

Nearby, Sarah Altenhofen, 9, said she wanted to draw hills and flowers and looked up with an excited expression.

"Should I do it like our prairie?" she asked with a smile.

Students also created poetry by looking at pictures of Kansas prairies.

Schlageck said Westmoreland lost its art teacher recently, and the school has been looking for ways to fill in the gaps.

Bringing students to the art museum has been one way to incorporate art into other parts of a school's program, she said.

During this semester's project, students learn about Kansas's landscape, geography and history.

"It has definitely been one of the most fun things and one of the most important things we do," Schlageck said.

The Creative Place, which was open Sept. 1, 2006, through Dec. 22, 2006, again will be open from Jan. 12 to Sept. 2, 2007.

Schlageck said the fall 2006 theme of printmaking allowed students and visitors to look at the museum's special collection pieces as well as make simple printing pieces.

"It was great," she said. "We had wonderful artwork up."

Lorrie Cross, Manhattan

Zeb Hutson, 8, works on a piece of perspective artwork at the Beach Museum of Art Friday morning. He and other third and fourth graders attended to Creative Place Gallery there.

resident, has worked as a docent at the art museum for two years.

Cross said she enjoys watching the children visit the art museum and discover new ideas when they look at or create artwork.

"They interact so well and they have vivid imaginations," she said. "It's not inhibited yet."

When she works with school programs, Cross said she is amazed at how they look at objects.

"I often tell them, 'You see things differently than I do.'"

Kansas Special Olympics benefit set for Saturday at Tuttle Creek

By Ben Hedges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A charity event at Tuttle Creek Reservoir could redefine the concept of a nice, cool dip.

Residents from Manhattan and surrounding communities are set to throw caution — and warmth — to the wind when they participate in the third-annual Polar Bear Plunge this Saturday. The plunge benefits the Kansas Special Olympics and its participants. It is one of many plunges around the state that directly support Kansas Special Olympic athletes.

Debbi DeVenuto, northeast area director of Special Olympics Kansas, said the plunge is a fun way to raise money during the winter months.

"It's invigorating jumping in the cold water," DeVenuto said. "And the plus is that the money is going to a very good cause."

She said the "plungers" can participate by themselves or form teams to raise money before the event takes place. On the day of the plunge, participants sprint into the chilly waters of Tuttle Creek Lake and soak for however long they can handle. DeVenuto said showmanship is always encouraged.

"We offer out prizes for the most enthusiastic plunger and the wimpiest plunger," DeVenuto said.

Plungers are allowed to wear costumes and make-up during the event and receive additional prizes based on costumes and for the most money raised.

Spc. John Balis, Spc. Shane LaBay and Sgt. Mark Kiel form the Delta Dragons, a team of soldiers participating in the plunge this year. Balis said he has plenty of experience jumping into frigid waters.

"I did it back when I lived in Massachusetts," Balis said.

"They do it every New Year's Day down in Boston."

This will be the second time Balis and Kiel participate in the Manhattan event after missing last year's plunge while deployed to Iraq. LaBay said he would be happy to take the plunge and promised to top last year's performance.

"This year we have something a little more creative planned," LaBay said.

Registration begins at 10:30 a.m. Saturday, and the plunge will be at noon. A charity auction, after the plunge, will feature items donated from businesses around Manhattan. DeVenuto said she expects a strong turnout of participants and hopes to top last year's total of more than $15,000.

DeVenuto said she welcomes spectators to the event.

"Just come on out and support other plungers," DeVenuto said. "It's a lot of fun."

EVERY MONDAY IN THE COLLEGIAN

TO THE POINT Filing date marks beginning of SGA elections

It has begun. The filing of two pairs of candidates for student body president and vice president Friday marks the beginning of the campaign. This means it won't be long now until it becomes impossible to swing a dead cat on campus without hitting a campaign sign, T-shirt or button. It also means there will be plenty of stories in this paper about whatever happens along the way.

The Collegian strives to maintain impartiality and fairness when dealing with all the candidates and takes several steps to prevent its coverage from unfairly altering the course of the campaign.

First, no Collegian employee is allowed to donate to any campaign. Those who run for office also must take a leave of absence from staff during the course of the election.

The Collegian also will go to great lengths to guarantee it gives equal coverage to all candidates.

Today's stories on the candidates for president and vice president, for example, are exactly 400 words in length. They are given similar placement in the paper each day.

The accompanying photographs maintain similar size and composition.

Candidates who file in the future will receive the same treatment.

The Collegian does not endorse candidates for any office, and its entire staff is discouraged from taking part in supporting any candidate.

With these steps and others, the Collegian works to ensure this campaign is fair, coverage is balanced and no action on our part alters the results.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

It's the little things

Students can improve the lives of others by avoiding annoying habits

Illustration by Elvis Achelpohl
COLLEGIAN

During the past two weeks, I've found there are more things that bother me than previously thought. I decided to share some of them with you with the hopes that if you are one of these people you could re-evaluate yourself.

These people are all on K-State's campus on a daily basis, and while probably not intentionally, are starting to annoy me.

The first people are the class alcoholics.

Everyday, regardless of the day of the week, you hear about these people's "last night."

Whether you want to know or not, they make sure the whole room knows who they made out with and how much they had to drink.

If you find yourself beginning sentences with, "I can't believe how ..." or, "I don't even remember ..." more than twice a minute, you should check out Lafene's 12-step program.

The next people are the inseparables — the friends (or couples) who insist on walking next to each other, despite the size of the sidewalk or how much of the sidewalk they are taking up.

Granted, I'm a nice guy and will go out of my way to walk in the mud/snow to accommodate certain groups, but even I have my limits.

If you can't stand to be more than a foot away from each other, you may have deeper issues. These people often double as the alcoholics, who have to stand that close because they blasted out their eardrums at the bar last night.

Along with the inseparables are the people who apparently have permission to get to class whenever they feel like it. I like to call them the wanderers. These are the people who amble down the middle of the sidewalk without a care in the world as they talk on the phone.

You may have all the time in the world, but I'm trying to get from Justin Hall to Calvin Hall in eight minutes, because there's that one teacher who hasn't mastered analog time.

Once you're in class, there's a whole new group of people that get to me.

First are the DJs. These people have never thought of the concept of taking their earphones off. They'll actually sit through class with their iPod on while they jam out to whatever seems to be cool at the time. Why did you even come — to sign the attendance sheet?

RYAN
SPENCER

The attendance sheet won't help you on the test, and if it does, you're in way too easy of a class. Along with the DJs are the journalists.

It's one thing to tear out the Sudoku and fill in a number in between note-taking, but the nerve of some people to have the paper out and flip through pages during lecture still gets me.

It's at this point that you encounter the wanderers again. They've just made it to the 50-minute class 15 minutes late. Surely they'll quietly take a seat in the back.

Nope. They'll stand there and look around, confused as to why everyone is turned around and the teacher is just standing there staring at them. Then, wearing the auditory equivalent of clown shoes, they'll make their way to the front, shuffle down a row, and stand there to take the coat off, open the bag, and ask the person next to them where we're at and where that attendance sheet is.

As times change, more and more I've noticed a new type of student in the classroom, the tech-savvy student. There is no reason — let me repeat (because it bears repeating) — no reason you need to be taking notes on a laptop or God forbid, a palm-pilot with a collapsible keyboard. Students for hundreds of years have found a pencil and paper to do just fine. There's no reason for you to check Facebook in the middle of class anyway — nobody wrote on your wall.

Finally, there's the sleeper. Now, I understand as much as anyone how little sleep some of us get. But as with the DJ, why do you come to class? I actually saw someone deny someone a seat to secure a sleeping spot.

They said they were saving it, but it ended up they wanted a place to spread out and take a nap.

You all know the people — you've seen them before or you're one of them yourself. The important thing to remember is respect.

As a student of higher education, there comes the expectation that you show respect for your teacher, everyone in your class, people you pass on the way to class, and hopefully yourself. A little common sense goes a long way.

The Great Lite-Brite Scare of 2007

I changed the TV station to Fox News to the live news conference already underway.

Before the media were two suspects charged with "placing hoax devices in a way that causes panic and disorderly conduct," and accused of costing the city of Boston more than $500,000.

Muffled under the booming anchor's voice, one completed a sentence with, "... umm, and how they're going to live their lives in the future and how they're going to look at the past."

On the left, his dreadlock-sporting counterpart objected strenuously, countering that, "For example, afro, I think, comes kind of from the '70s, but then again there's other styles."

Walt, what? This wasn't your average press conference. But then again, it stemmed from a panicked day that wasn't average either.

At about 8 a.m. Wednesday, a city worker reported a suspicious device attached to an interstate on-ramp. Police quickly swarmed the area, closing the portion of the interstate and pulverizing the device with a water cannon.

Then more reports came in, cuing police in on a dozen or so more devices in the metropolitan area.

Eventually, someone happened to shift one device to a darker area and the lights switched on, literally.

After consulting with a "Boston police analyst" — the Boston Herald's words, not mine — authorities realized that the device was the outline of a Mooninite from the animated comedy "Aqua Teen Hunger Force," and it was giving them the finger.

The investigation shifted from organized panic to anger, and police quickly found a target. Peter Berdovsky and Sean Stevens, the two artists who installed the advertisements, were arrested overnight and held pending a hearing that next morning.

Five-hundred thousand dollars is a lot of money to be spent on a false alarm — enough to make a good case for failure somewhere along the line. Between the charged artists and law enforcement, something messed up.

We shouldn't blame the artists, as they aren't guilty of the charges against them. Those charges require an intent to cause panic, and even the arraigning judge recognized that they meant no harm.

There are still more facts in their favor. The devices had been in the Boston area for more than two weeks, as well as several other major metropolitan areas, such as Philadelphia, San Francisco, New York and Chicago.

In no other city did their presence raise an alarm or cause a ruckus. Boston wasn't only on the slow side in noticing them but also uniquely dull in mistaking them for an improvised explosive device.

These kinds of false alarms are inevitable when the government commits itself to stopping threats when they're still a possibility, but it shouldn't be this expensive and this much of a media circus. The authorities only have added to the mess by charging these two men and accusing them of wrongdoing.

Berdovsky and Stevens wanted to make exactly that point, which is why they turned the press conference into a mockery of the usual course of events.

The lawyer advised them to not discuss the charges against them with the media. Instead, the two dove into a discussion of 1970s haircuts.

They clearly laid down the ground rules: they would only answer hair-related questions, and the intent behind their press conference was to answer some pressing questions about particular varieties of hair.

For example, they wanted to know if the Beatles' hairstyles ended abruptly at the end of the 1960s or somehow infiltrated the beginning of the next decade.

Most reporters' brains shut down, with many shouting tough (and leading) questions in the hope that one of the two suspects would somehow forget the topic and respond.

But every single one was shot down with the refrain, "That's also not a hair-related question." Finally, one reporter adapted. "Are you afraid that if you go to prison you'll get your hair cut?"

As Berdovsky was sporting dreadlocks, he was the one to answer.

After mulling over the question for a few seconds (and congratulating the reporter on a "good question"), he finally answered, "Whatever happens, I feel like my hair is safe at the moment. Any other hair questions?"

REVOLUTION TO BE TELEvised

THE DALLAS MORNING NEWS

The late media theorist Marshall McLuhan was a true visionary. Few of his ardent admirers, however, realize how deeply conservative he was. A devout Catholic, McLuhan said he sought to understand how media shaped our consciousness.

"I am resolutely opposed to all innovation, all change," McLuhan said. "But I am determined to understand what's happening. Because I don't choose just to sit and let the juggernaut roll over me."

McLuhan, who came to prominence in the 1960s and died in 1980, was one of the first to understand how radically the electronic media stood to change culture and society. His best-known aphorism — "The medium is the message" — was that what is said matters less than how it is said.

WRONG NUMBER FRIENDSHIP

THE WICHITA EAGLE

The calls starting coming to her home about a year ago.

Jenny Anderson would answer the phone. A man calling from a nursing home would hear her voice, apologize and say he was trying to reach his daughter.

A week later he would call again.

After a few weeks, Jenny stopped answering when she saw the number for the College Hill Nursing and Rehabilitation Center come up on caller ID.

She began to wonder about the man, who said his name was Tellous West.

"One day, I got curious," she said. One day, she showed up at the nursing home, and asked to see him. She told him who she was.

"Your angel wings are so big, I don't know how you carry them around," he said.

Now Jenny visits him every week.

3 MILLION MUSLIMS JOIN IN PEACE PRAYER

TONGI, Bangladesh — Some 3 million Muslim devotees raised their hands in prayer for global peace, putting aside their country's sometimes violent struggle with political corruption and Islamic extremists, at one of the world's largest religious gatherings.

The final prayer Sunday capped a three-day Islamic gathering on the sandy banks of the River Turag in a small industrial town just north of Dhaka, Bangladesh's capital.

The annual gathering shuns politics, which have become increasingly bloody in Bangladesh, and focuses on reviving the tenets of Islam and promoting peace and harmony.

About 20,000 security officials, including troops, have been deployed to the area to prevent violence, said police official Biswas, following months of violent protests to push for electoral reform.

UN BIRD FLU CHIEF SAYS TO EXPECT MORE CASES

JAKARTA, Indonesia — The world should expect more bird flu outbreaks in the coming months, the U.N. official coordinating the global fight against the virus warned Sunday after Britain recorded its first case of the H5N1 strain on a commercial farm.

Dr. David Nabarro said, however, that he did not expect the virus to spread in Britain to neighboring farms because of the quick containment measures put in place by the government.

Most people killed so far have been infected by domestic fowl and the virus remains very hard for humans to catch. But experts fear it could mutate into a form that easily spreads among humans, sparking a pandemic with the potential to kill millions.

JAPAN'S RULING BLOC HIT WITH POLL SETBACK

TOKYO — Japan's ruling bloc lost a key local election on Sunday, a possible bellwether of public support after a Cabinet minister caused an uproar by calling women "birth-giving machines."

The setback compounds the problems for Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's administration, which has also lost a minister and a top adviser in separate scandals.

Most recently, Health Minister Hakuo Yanagisawa infuriated the public by calling the country's women "birth-giving machines" who had to "do their best per head" to stem Japan's falling birthrate.

Yanagisawa quickly apologized, and Abe has repeatedly rebuffed calls from opposition and civic groups for his resignation. But Sunday's weak showing at the polls is expected to increase pressure on Yanagisawa.

The minister told Kyodo News agency he was determined to stay on, despite ruling bloc's poor showing in the election.

Kenji Kitahashi, a former parliamentarian backed by three opposition parties, beat a candidate backed by the ruling Liberal Democratic Party and a junior coalition party in a tight mayoral race in the southern city of Kitakyushu.

20 KILLED, 340,000 FORCED FROM HOMES

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Boats ferried supplies to desperate residents of Indonesia's flood-stricken capital on Sunday as rivers burst their banks following days of rain. At least 20 people have been killed and almost 340,000 forced from their homes, officials said.

Hundreds of people scrambled to the second floors of their houses to escape the rising waters. Some found themselves trapped, while others refused to leave despite warnings that the muddy flood waters — running over 13 feet deep in places — may rise further in the coming days.

"Jakarta is now on the highest alert level," said Sihar Simanjuntak, an official who monitors the rivers that crisscross the city.

Purpose of Oscars to give credit where due

Editor,

Ryan Spencer, just who do you think you are, mister?

After reading your thoughtless opinion piece on the Oscars in last Monday's paper, I'm convinced you never actually saw "Million Dollar Baby," "Crash" or "Brokeback Mountain."

If you had, there's no way you could justify your whiny comments about why awards were given to these movies instead of "Harry Potter" or "Pirates of the Caribbean."

As far as the movie agendas go, beside "Fahrenheit 9/11," I don't believe any of those movies had agendas. They had effective themes; maybe you should learn the difference.

"Million Dollar Baby," "Crash" and "Brokeback Mountain" all share basic qualities that are found in every meaningful film: powerful themes about the human experience and a desire to change the way people think about and treat each other.

How can they not be rewarded for such noble aims? A lot of people enjoy Harry Potter and Pirates, myself included, but they are not even in the same league as the other movies you are comparing them to.

If the only thing you care about is box office numbers, then you need to stop writing opinion pieces on movies because all your arguments are destined to suck.

Obviously, you never learned it's quality that counts, not quantity. The purpose of the Oscars is to give credit where credit is due.

Examine figures before making movie claims

Editor,

While I wasn't quite certain about either the purpose of or point to Ryan Spencer's recent column, "Lights, Cameras, Lobby," I did question his statement on how "you and I don't go to movies to be lectured on the finer points of global warming or have stereotypes of diversity shoved down our throats."

Actually, if box office receipts are any indication of a film's worth (as Spencer apparently believes), we do.

This past year, millions of people like "you and I" went to see Al Gore's documentary on the effects of global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth," enough so that the film has earned almost $24 million in box office receipts alone.

The year before, millions of viewers went to see "March of the Penguins," a film that addresses the effects of climate change on the future of the emperor penguin species.

As of late November 2005, the movie had grossed more than $77 million in theaters.

Regarding films dealing with diversity, we're actually quite fond of them, as well.

One of Spencer's own examples, "Crash" (2004), grossed more than $54 million in box-office sales as of April 2006.

What I presume Spencer has worked himself into a lather over, though, are films that contain what he calls an "agenda," albeit only ones with which he disagrees.

Yet he fails to realize that all films are made around an agenda, be it to make money, to entertain, to push a point or a combination of the above.

As a result, his anger seems misdirected and, ultimately, without relevance.

Signature win gives Wildcats shot at Big 12

AUSTIN, Texas — A six-straight win run is an impressive feat for any team, especially during conference play, but how were we to know if K-State was for real?

The men's basketball team went into Saturday's matchup with No. 22 Texas riding the longest current win streak of any team in the Big 12 Conference, but the Wildcats hadn't beaten a so-called quality opponent.

Their five conference wins came against four teams that all have less than a .500 record in Big 12 play. K-State beat Nebraska, Missouri and Baylor at home and took care of Iowa State and Missouri on the road.

In order to get accepted into the NCAA Tournament at season's end, a team has to meet certain qualifications. One of the biggest pieces to the postseason tournament puzzle is a quality win against a tough opponent, and K-State had yet to meet that requirement before Saturday.

"We needed a so-called 'signature win,'" coach Bob Huggins said. "That's one of the big things (the selection committee members) look for."

The Wildcats finally got that much-needed victory by defeating the Longhorns 73-72 at the Erwin Center.

"A win like this shows how much potential we have and what we are capable of doing," said senior Cartier Martin.

He hit a career-high seven 3-point shots against Texas and scored a team-high 27 points in the game.

"We don't want to settle for second, especially now that we have a chance to be in first place," he said.

With the win over Texas, the Wildcats (17-6, 6-2 Big 12) are now in a three-way tie for second place in the Big 12 with their seven-game streak.

K-State has eight games remaining on its schedule, and it isn't too far-fetched to say it could make a run at the Big 12 regular season title.

The Wildcats have only three more games against teams that have a winning conference record. If they can find a way to win one of those games while taking care of business in the other five, then there is a chance.

At the start of the season, I wasn't sure they had what it took, but after Saturday, I know they'll be in the hunt until the end.

K-State's 3-pointers pave way to victory over Texas

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

AUSTIN, Texas — K-State earned every bit of its 73-72 win against No. 22 Texas Saturday at the Erwin Center. It's just that Longhorn coach Rick Barnes made things a little easier on them.

Barnes, regarded as one of the best coaches in the Big 12 Conference, played the numbers. The Wildcats came into the game shooting only 31 percent from 3-point range and have struggled with making outside shots all season.

So the strategy for Texas, a team that plays a lot of 2-3 zone, was to make the Wildcats settle for long-range jumpers.

The result? A 14-of-27 3-point shooting performance by K-State, highlighted by senior Cartier Martin's seven 3-pointers in 11 attempts. Senior Lance Harris added five threes in nine attempts, as the seniors combined for 46 points.

"I was feeling good today," Martin said. "I felt like I could make (threes) at any time I had the opportunity. They were playing off me a little bit, so I just rose up and shot the ball. We were surprised they stayed in the 2-3 zone as long as they did."

So were the 13,662 in attendance. K-State made five 3-pointers in the final five minutes of the first half, helping them recover from an early 9-point deficit to get back in the game. Harris made four straight at one point.

"After seeing my first and second shots go down, you feel like you can just make any shot you are given," Harris said. "I was shooting in a rhythm, stepping in and making shots. I had to kind of carry our team on my back."

Texas decided to stick with the zone in the second half, especially after freshmen guards Justin Mason and D.J. Augustin got into foul trouble. Given the Longhorns' lack of depth, they couldn't afford to lose two of their starting guards to reach-in or contact fouls inside.

The Wildcats stayed patient against the zone, quickly moving the ball around the perimeter and working for the best shot.

They were able to hit junior David Hoskins on quite a few entry passes in the middle, and that's what really opened things up.

Each time the Longhorns collapsed inside to help with Hoskins, he found the open man beyond the arc.

Usually Hoskins, who had five assists, will attack the basket, but Texas kept trying to pack the paint with defenders to take away easy opportunities.

Martin couldn't have been happier. He made six threes in the second half, including a dagger that gave K-State a 71-68 lead with 40 seconds left.

"I think they got comfortable with the zone," Texas sophomore A.J. Abrams said. "They just started finding open areas. I wouldn't say we stayed in it too long. I just think they got comfortable with it."

But Texas did stay in the zone too long. The Wildcats committed zero Akeem Wright defends Kevin Durant during the first half. Wright had the duty of defending Durant for most of the game and held him scoreless for nine minutes of the first half. Durant finished with 32 points in a losing effort.

turnovers in the second half and had just six all game.

It's hard to envision K-State being able to exchange 2-point baskets with the Longhorns to get back into the game, especially after falling behind early.

It took every last 3-point shot to beat the Longhorns, and if K-State didn't convert on 51.9 percent of its 3-point attempts, it could have been a rout.

"The three is a great equalizer when they're making it," Barnes said. "They haven't shot like that all year. When we needed a stop, we couldn't get it done."

FBN | Colts coach Dungy bests longtime friend

MIAMI — Long saddled with a reputation as a coach who couldn't win the big one, Tony Dungy shook that label when Indianapolis beat Chicago 29-17 in Super Bowl XLII Sunday.

The biggest win of Dungy's career came against his close friend and protege, Bears coach Lovie Smith. They were the first black head coaches in the 41-year history of the Super Bowl.

When the game ended, Dungy was hoisted onto the shoulders of his team. He switched his blue Colts cap for a white one that read "NFL champions" and walked to midfield, where he and Smith exchanged words and a hug.

"It is a fast track," junior Morgan Bonds said. "It is the fastest track that is close to us."

Bonds ran her personal best in the 600-yard run with a time of 1:20.80 at the Frank Sevigne Husker Invitational, which is the second-fastest in school history.

The men also did well in the 600-yard run. Sophomore Tevan Everett won the event with a time of 1:09.32.

It was his personal best and third-fastest in school history. He finished just ahead of his twin brother, sophomore Tevas Everett, and freshman Sam James.

Tevas finished second with a time of 1:10.47. James ran a time of 1:10.87 to finish third.

In the women's mile, sophomore Liliani Mendez ran a time of 4:49.62, her personal best. It was good enough for second place and was a second off the NCAA provisional qualifying time.

TEN | Shockers beats another Big 12 team

Wichita State continued its dominance over the Big 12 Conference, beating the K-State women's tennis team 6-1 Saturday at Wichita.

Klimova

Prior to the loss, K-State (1-1, 0-0 Big 12) had defeated Wichita State (3-0, 0-0 Missouri Valley Conference) 10 times in a row. Wichita State beat Big 12 opponent Nebraska last weekend before playing host to K-

State this weekend.

Last year when K-State played Wichita State, the Shockers swept the Shockers 7-0, but this year, Wichita State played three freshmen.

In No. 2 singles, freshman Florentina Hanisch defeated junior Tamar Kvaratskhelia (6-4, 6-2). In No. 4 singles, freshman Stephanie Dalmacio defeated sophomore Katerina Kudlackova (6-4, 3-6, 7-6 [4]).

Sophomore Maria Perevoshchikova prevented the sweep by defeating WSU freshman Lenore Lazaroiu (6-2, 6-2).

In doubles, the Shockers swept all of the Wildcat pairings. Senior Madina Rakham and Hanisch defeated senior Olga Klimova and Kudlackova (8-0). Dalmacio and sophomore Anna Egorova defeated juniors Fernanda Da Valle and Viviana Yrureta (8-3). Lazaroiu and sophomore Torrie Browning defeated Perevoshchikova and Kvaratskhelia (9-7).

GLF | K-State poised for opening tournament in Mexico this spring

After finishing in the top 10 in all but one fall tournament, the K-State women's golf team will look to continue that success in the spring season.

The Wildcats get their first chance today at the Baja Classic at Ensenada, Mexico.

The field consists of 12 teams, eight of which are ranked in the top 100 in the Golfweek/Sagarin women's team rankings. Colorado, Kansas and Texas Tech are the other three teams representing the Big 12 Conference.

The Wildcats shot 292 in the final round of the fall Watts Invitational tournament. It was a season low for K-State, beating the team's previous best of 306 at New Mexico State.

The combined team score of 910 at the Watts Invitational was also a season low, beating the squad's 925, which K-State shot at New Mexico State.

The Wildcats finished the fall ranked 21st in the Golfweek/Sagarin Women's District Rankings.

Wildcats drop 3rd straight game against Longhorns

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The theme of the game for K-State could have been season lows.

The Wildcats (15-7, 3-6 Big 12 Conference) shot a dismal 25.5 percent from the floor and failed to score a 3-point shot for the first time since 2003 in a 61-34 drubbing at the hands of Texas (16-7, 5-4) Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Wildcats scored first when senior Claire Coggins connected on a jump shot with 18:57 remaining in the first half, and it would be the only lead for K-State.

Texas soon tied the score with a jump shot from senior Tiffany Jackson, and from that point on the Longhorns continued to expand their lead.

Texas' defense debilitated the Wildcats, who often were forced down to the wire on their offensive possessions and scored just 14 points in the first half — the lowest output for K-State in a half this season.

K-State shot just 22 percent on 7-of-31 shooting in the first half, including going 0-of-8 from behind the arc.

"It was just one of those nights for us," sophomore Shalee Lehning said. "We just weren't hitting shots."

K-State's offense picked up some in the second half, cutting Texas' lead to 11 when freshman Ashley Sweat scored with 14:11 remaining. That was the closest the Wildcats would get, however, as once again the Longhorns expanded their lead throughout the remainder of the half, finishing with the 27-point win.

Jackson and junior Erneisha Bailey paced Texas with 12 points apiece. Freshman Carla Cortijo added 10 points and four assists for the Longhorns, who recorded a season-high 24 assists.

"Texas beat us, straight up, and they beat us bad," coach Deb Patterson said. "That's the worst loss we've suffered in a long time."

Patterson said she was to blame for the Wildcats' inability to get into a position where they could get good looks at the basket. However, she said she was pleased with her team's effort throughout the game, both offensively and defensively.

"I credit our players for working to compete hard," she said. "I don't feel like anyone quit or gave up. We just really struggled with our aggressiveness and knowing what we needed every possession."

"It feels really bad, because we didn't play well ... but I understand we lost to a very talented basketball team."

Saturday's defeat was the third-straight for the Wildcats, who fell 66-55 at Colorado Wednesday after leading by 17 at the half.

Coggins, who along with Sweat led the Wildcats in scoring with 8 points, said the last three halves K-State has played are among the worst she's experienced while at K-State.

"It's disappointing, but I can look at every single one of my teammates and know that we're going to come back on Monday and work hard," Coggins said.

"This team doesn't die, and we don't stop."

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

K-State's Claire Coggins goes after a loose ball Saturday in the Wildcats' 61-34 loss to Texas. Coggins connected on a jump shot with 18:57 remaining in the first half of the game, making it the only lead for K-State's battle against the Longhorns.

K-State faculty, students sponsor high school dance workshop

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Twenty-eight high school students from Kansas entered Nichols Hall on Friday to learn some dance skills and possibly find a future academic major.

K-State's dance program was host to its annual High School Dance Day.

Michelle Thomas, high-school junior from Gardner, said she is considering a major in dance and expressed her enthusiasm to take part in the workshop.

"I just came across the information on the K-State Web site and immediately decided to register for the Dance Day," Thomas said. "I couldn't wait to come and see what the K-State dance program was like."

The day started early, with registration at 7:15 a.m., followed by ballet and jazz classes for all students. After several hours of solid dancing, the dancers and their parents broke for lunch, said Julie Pentz, assistant professor of dance and event organizer.

After the midday break, the high-school seniors had an opportunity to audition for K-State dance scholarships. K-State students also taught tap and modern dance classes in the afternoon.

Vicky Henning, senior in elementary education, helped lead an afternoon modern dance class for the workshop.

"The modern class was difficult to plan because we weren't sure what to expect from high-school-aged dancers," Henning said. "But the girls all caught on right away and had a lot of fun with it."

Pentz said there also were activities planned to help keep the parents busy throughout the day. An admissions officer was there to answer questions parents had about sending their students to K-State, and many of the parents scheduled regular campus visits while they were here. Several of the parents also chose to sit in on their children's dance sessions.

"It's been a great experience for the kids," said Carolyn Thomas, mother of high-school dancer Michelle. "Everything was very well organized, and the instructors were very helpful."

Student columnist from 1920s discusses inequalities in sports

By F. Marshall Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Editor's note: The K-State Collegian published this column Nov. 19, 1929. This piece by Frank Marshall Davis is the second in a series published this month to honor Davis' memory.

When Davis came to K-State in 1924, he was one of only 26 black students enrolled. He wrote a weekly column called "A Diplomat in Black," in which he discussed politics, history and campus life with humor and candor.

We ask readers to enjoy this piece of history.

H.H. Myers, star quarterback of New York University, did not play football against either Georgia or Missouri in spite of the importunities of the Eastern press and fellow students ... it seems that there was a "gentlemen's agreement" made with both schools ... Myers, you see, is a Negro.

Potential first-string blacks and linemen are constantly kept from playing at KU, Nebraska and Kansas State (famed for its democracy) because of the accident of color ... made big by a standing "gentlemen's agreement" with Oklahoma and Missouri.

"Gentlemen's agreements" are, apparently, a last resort to keep a regular eleven from looking bad because of the ability of darker stars on the opposing teams ... and the color superiority myth seems even more far-fetched when you have to legislate to keep it.

Iowa State is the only big valley school in recent years with guts enough to play a Negro on its team ... Holloway

Smith played tackle there in 1926-27 ... and made quite a name for himself although the gentlemen of the conference agreed not to play him in certain games ... but if he contaminated the Ames team or ruined the high moral or social standing of opposing players they forgot to mention it.

I've often wondered what thoughts occur in the minds of the gentlemen who make these agreements ... obviously, when a dark student makes a football team over the natural prejudices of most coaches, he's exceptional ... and when he does make it, there's a grave danger that he'll make the all-conference eleven in the place of your star ... and maybe the All-American ... Missouri and Oklahoma have a right to be afraid ... they have no Negro students.

Three colored lads are playing football in the smaller Kansas colleges this fall ... however, as there have been no agreements made to bar any of them from participating in athletic contests; this might tend to show that the gentlemen, if any, at Kansas institutions have nothing to do with athletics.

I'll expect something more original than the hackneyed "if you don't like this place, why don't you go somewhere else" ... but anyway, it's something to think about ... especially when the darker students are liberal enough to go to the games, attend pep meetings, and cheer for the winning or losing Wildcats ... and not a one of them allowed to play because of the "gentlemen" of the Big Six.

Candidates prepare for student government elections

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN
Matt Wagner, senior in management information systems, and Lydia Peele, junior in secondary education, filed to run for student body president and vice president Friday afternoon.

Feedback builds campaign platform for duo

By Brie Handgraaf
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After years in student government, Matt Wagner and Lydia Peele said they want to do more to help K-State students.

Wagner, senior in management information systems, and Peele, junior in secondary education, filed to run for student body president and vice president Friday afternoon.

They are running on a three-tier platform, which consists of academic accountability, study abroad fee elimination and a financial planning center.

"One of the key things we think is going on at K-State is the issue with textbooks," Peele said. "Our plan would require professors to submit their book orders the semester before."

The list of books then would be compiled and available online to allow students to find the best prices. However, textbooks are only part of academic accountability. The candidates said they also hope to tackle the issue of the week before finals, known as dead week.

"Right now, we don't have a very firm or structured policy for the 15th week of classes, and so we've looked a little bit at the University of Nebraska," Peele said.

"They have a system in place for certain rules and guidelines that professors and students have to abide by for dead week. We would like to set up something similar to that."

The elimination of the $50 application fee for studying abroad is the next tier in the platform.

"Our plan actually eliminates that fee and allows students to go in and find out information about studying abroad," Wagner said. "Then if they decide to go ahead, they can pay the study abroad office the other fees that are required and travel abroad the following semester or the following year."

The pair's third platform tier is to create a financial planning center to help students with their budgets. It would be a free service to help students understand mortgages, contracts, credit cards, taxes and more.

"We think that is key to helping students be able to establish a hold on their own money and figure out where they are going," Peele said.

The pair said they developed their platform by talking with students and learning what they really wanted.

"Our main focus is getting out and talking to students — making sure the issues that we are running on really do fit them and make life better for the students on campus," Wagner said.

The pair has a Web site, www.ksyou.org, to promote their campaign.

Jim Mosimann, senior in political science, and Nick Piper, junior in finance, filed to run for student body president and vice president Friday morning.

Men form primary goals for presidential run

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jim Mosimann and Nick Piper said they have seen what this campus is all about.

The pair filed to run for student body president and vice president Friday morning.

Mosimann, senior in political science, and Piper, junior in finance, said they met two years ago and realized quickly they were both leaders on the K-State campus and had visions of where they wanted their school to go. They said they decided they would make good leaders after discussing those visions.

The pair is focusing its campaign around four core goals. The first goal is to expand Peters Recreation Complex. They said they felt this issue was worth carrying out after talking with students.

"We feel that there is enough energy in campus to make that happen," Mosimann said.

The second core goal within the pair's platform is the issue of parking on campus. They are specifically focused on the upcoming parking garage on the south side of the K-State Student Union.

"They are only going to give the students 300 of the 1,400 spots, and we feel that is unfair," Piper said.

The pair said it also will try to keep parking pass prices down.

The third core goal for the campaign will be to require professors to post textbook lists online. The pair said this will open the book market and allow students to have more options when it comes to buying books.

The last goal is to have Thanksgiving break extended so it lasts a whole week instead of having students attend class for two days and take three off.

Mosimann and Piper said they have talked to many people about these issues and were satisfied with the progress that has been made.

The pair also emphasized that its campaign platform is constantly evolving as students raise more concerns, and they have many secondary goals that they will accomplish as the primary goals are achieved.

Both candidates have several years experience in student government.

Mosimann is in his third year with Student Senate. He served in Student Governing Association his sophomore year as Student Affairs and Social Services Committee chairman, and he is a College of Arts and Sciences senator this year.

He also has completed political internships in Topeka and Washington.

Piper is in his second year in Student Senate and was elected as a business senator his sophomore year.

He also serves as Allocations Committee chairman.

Lymphoma Society benefit features local bands, giveaways

Shhh band members Court Caywood, senior in secondary education, and Simon Bates, Manhattan resident, play at Auntie Mae's Parlor Thursday evening for a Lymphoma Society benefit show. Pazuzu Cabbage and Jonathan also played. All bands played free of charge.

By Eric Brown
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bands Pazuzu Cabbage, Jonathan and Shhh performed sets to a packed house at Auntie Mae's Thursday night in typical fashion.

With the live entertainment came a cover charge, but of the numerous $3 entry fees collected at the door, none would be pocketed by the bands. The three bands playing performed free of charge as part of the Lymphoma Society Benefit show.

The event raised more than $800, which will be donated to the Kansas Chapter of the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society in Wichita.

Brian Bowman, an engineer at Cameron International Corporation in Salina, and Jeff Denney, owner of Auntie Mae's Parlor put together

Thursday night's show.

Bowman said his mother died of Lymphoma in 2003, and his father is a survivor of the disease.

"That's definitely what got me into this," Bowman said. "This is a cause that needs funding, and I'm willing to do what I can to help with it."

He said planning for the benefit show began when he proposed the idea to Denney, who was eager to help with the event.

"Jeff was really enthusiastic toward the show and really did a lot of the legwork with it," said Bowman, who worked at Auntie Mae's Parlor from 1990 to 1994.

"I just kind of planted the seed, and he took it from there. I can't thank him enough for all he's done. I'm also incredibly grateful toward everyone else that was a part of this, especially the bands for volunteering their time and energy."

Band members said they had no problem contributing their services for free.

"It's really just a pleasure and an honor to play at benefit shows," said David Spiker, solo member of the one-man band Jonathan. "Being in a number of bands over the years, I have always looked forward to benefit shows and have made sure to schedule events like this."

Along with the musical acts of the night, the benefit show featured potential giveaways for audience members who purchased raffle tickets.

"For being a first-time event, I feel the show went really well," Bowman said. "As of now, I haven't made any definite plans for future benefit shows, but I'm definitely interested in doing more."

Dept. of Commerce and Housing gives local emergency shelter $400,000 grant

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A mother makes $1,000 a month, has two small children and lives in a two-bedroom house that costs $600 per month for rent alone. She has just enough money to pay for her family's needs and bills.

Then her car breaks down. It will cost $1,000 to fix. She faces paying rent or repairing the car. Either way, the family is likely to become homeless.

Such situations often force people to go to the Manhattan Emergency Shelter, Inc., Executive Director Mandy Chapman Semple said.

"People go through hurdles of obstacles until they hit a brick wall. Our job is to help minimize the hurdles," she said. "We create sustainable solutions so they will not have to come back here."

The shelter was a temporary home to about 600 people last year, John Carlin, shelter board member, told the Manhattan Mercury. However, he said they had to turn away more than 100 people.

"It is hard to tell people in need that they cannot stay here," Semple said.

The Kansas Department of Commerce and Housing gave MES a $400,000 last month to fund a new facility and remedy the problem.

The grant brings the total number of contributions and pledges closer to the $1.1 million that will be needed for the new 12,000-square foot emergency shelter. MES still needs $200,000 to complete it.

The new facility will be on the northwest corner of Fourth and Yuma streets.

It will have 7,500 square feet of living space to accommodate 52 people, double the amount the current building can accommodate, and a full-kitchen, dining area and office space for staff.

"We have to use every nook and cranny here because space is very limited," Semple said.

The new facility plan has two phases. The first is the emergency shelter.

The second phase is the transitional living program facility, which will house 32 people.

Semple said due to the increase of clients in the past year, the converted house is just not big enough.

"As rent increases because of competition for housing, it becomes more and more difficult for people to keep up with their rent," she said.

She said even those who do qualify for low-income housing cannot be placed because of the long waiting list.

Inside the current MES building, there are five bedrooms: one for single women, one for single men and two for families, Semple said.

The rooms are small with worn furniture. One of the family rooms has a used bunk bed, crib and twin bed. The windows have plastic over them to keep cold air out.

The new facility will have three wings — one for each of those groups, she said.

It also will have an unfinished basement used to store clients' furniture from previous living arrangements and clothes for when they leave MES.

For now, living conditions are cramped.

"Clients have to take turns in the kitchen," she said. "It is tough at dinnertime with all the kids running around."

The community makes generous donations to MES including toiletries, food, clothing and its time, Semple said.

Kate Daniels, senior in family life and community service, said she saw that the MES staff genuinely cared about the clients.

"There was a little girl staying there with her mom during her birthday," Daniels said. "The staff threw her a birthday party and even bought her a Barbie cake. She was so excited."

Bush looks for $2.9 million to fund Iraq war

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Bush will send Congress a $2.9 trillion spending request today that seeks money to fight the Iraq war and tries to restrain the cost of the government's health care programs.

Responding to the new political realities of a Democratic-controlled Congress, Bush will propose balancing the budget in five years, matching a goal put forward by Democratic leaders. Bush would achieve that feat while protecting his cherished first-term tax cuts.

The arrival of the massive four-volume set of green budget books, which will cover the budget year that begins Oct. 1, will be followed by months of debate in Congress. Democrats charged that Bush wants to make painful cuts across a wide swath of government programs while protecting tax cuts that will make the deficit worse after 2012.

"This budget is plunging us toward a cliff that will take us right into a chasm of debt," Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad, D-N.D., said in an interview Sunday.

"In real terms, Bush's plan is going to have very substantial cuts by the fifth year of this budget in all of the domestic priorities from education and health care to law enforcement and veterans," Conrad said. "With Democrats in control, we will have different priorities."

The federal deficit hit an all-time high of $413 billion with Bush in 2004. It has been declining since that time, and the 2008 budget projects it will continue to decline and show a surplus in 2012, three years after Bush leaves office.

To accomplish those reductions, Bush would allow only modest growth in the government programs outside of defense and homeland security. He is proposing eliminations or sharp reductions in 141 government programs, for a savings over five years of $12 billion, although Congress has rejected many of the same proposals over the past two years.

Bush also will seek to trim spending on farm subsidies by $18 billion during a five-year period, mainly by reducing payments to wealthier farmers, an effort certain to spark resistance among farm-state lawmakers.

Chinese association prepares for Lunar New Year events

By Ben Hedges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Chinese Students and Scholars Association will bring the celebration of the upcoming Chinese Lunar New Year to Manhattan with the Chinese Cultural Festival Wednesday through Sunday.

"The communication between Americans and Chinese is reaching a new level," said Charley Zheng, faculty adviser to the association. "We think this is a good opportunity for people to learn something from our Chinese students."

This is an event members of campus and the whole community can enjoy, said Jenny Yang, graduate student in journalism and mass communications and entertainment minister for the association.

"We want to extend participation to everyone," Yang said. "We want every Manhattan resident to come and enjoy."

The festival will feature events spanning the entire week, featuring many aspects of Chinese culture including arts, food and entertainment.

The Exhibition of Chinese Culture will take place at noon Wednesday and Thursday in the K-State Student Union. The event will feature a martial arts demonstration and a number of exhibits featuring the traditional arts and crafts of China.

An Interactive Chinese Food Show will take place from 4 to 6 p.m. Friday at the International Student Center, featuring foods from Chinese restaurants in Manhattan.

Yang said the show is considered interactive because people who attend have the opportunity to be a part of the show.

"You can observe how the chefs cook the food, and you can actually eat the food," Yang said.

The week of festivities concluding with the Chinese Spring Festival Gala at 3 p.m. Sunday at McCain Auditorium.

The gala will feature Kung-Fu performances and several Chinese musical and dance pieces performed by professionals, faculty and students.

All events are free and open to the public, and tickets are still available for the gala.

Yang said the festival is a way of giving back to the community that has been so hospitable to Chinese students.

"We want to contribute to the international friendship of our community," Yang said.

Residents discuss recent murder

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Residents of Flint Hills Place met Jan. 29 to discuss the recent murder there, as well as other issues of concern to the community, Capt. John Doebling of the Riley County Police Department said.

The residents called the meeting, Doebling said, and members of the RCPD attended at their request.

Forty to 50 residents attended the meeting, he said.

Sgt. Tim Schuck, officer Julia Eickholt and Doebling attended the meeting to respond to questions about safety in the Flint Hills area, he said.

"They're scared," Doebling said. "One of their residents has been murdered."

The recent murder of Terrel Morris, 1369 Flint Hills Place, is only one of the residents' concerns, Doebling said.

Some of the complaints involved loud noise from stereos, televisions and voices as well as cars speeding through the area, he said.

The meeting was a good idea but should occur more often, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the RCPD said.

"If they would do this on a continuous basis, semi-annually, they would have a lot of their problems solved," he said.

The problems that the residents of Flint Hills Place are noticing happen on a continual basis, Quintanar said, and they happen in various parts of Manhattan, not only that area.

Doebling recommended calling police or Crime Stoppers if a resident sees any suspicious activity in the area.

picious activity in the area.

"The best thing would be to score some tags and call Crime Stoppers," he said.

Police are continuing to investigate the murder of Morris and have received several tips from people in the Flint Hills area, Doebling said.

"We're looking at everything we can look at," he said. "Taking practical safety precautions such as locking doors or not walking alone at night are some steps that residents can take, he said."

"I do the same thing in my neighborhood," Doebling said.

If anyone sees any suspicious activity, they are encouraged to call the RCPD at (785) 537-2112 or Crime Stoppers of Manhattan at (785) 539-7777.

Scientists develop cheaper, easier to remove tattoo ink

By Katelynn Hasler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For some, the tattoo of a flaming chopper that was so cool to show off at parties might not look quite as sweet under the fluorescent lights of a first real job.

For others, the significant other they were certain was the one has up and left them with nothing but his or her name emblazoned across their arm.

A group of scientists at Harvard University, along with the company Freedom-2, is developing a new type of tattoo ink that will help solve such grievances by making tattoos easier and cheaper to remove, according to Freedom-2's Web site, www.freedom2ink.com. The new ink is scheduled to be released next year.

"I think this will be a really good option," said Krista Ising, sophomore in English. "I would have gotten it if I had the choice, because you never know how much you're really going to like anything you do."

The new ink is made from a combination of biodegradable dyes and a polymer that the Food and Drug Administration has approved. The polymer is a type of plastic that cannot be absorbed by the body. The ink is coated with tiny capsules of this polymer. Because of the capsules, the ink is completely permanent until a laser surgery is performed to remove the tattoo.

A single laser treatment breaks the polymer capsules, releasing the ink which is then broken down and absorbed by the body. Current methods of tattoo removal require at least one laser treatment for each color of ink used and sometimes are unsuccessful, said Rox Anderson, a doctor helping to develop the ink, in a National Public Radio article.

In the same article, Martin Schmieg, president of Freedom-2, said the company's goal is to provide more safety to consumers and to allow tattoo wearers the opportunity to change their minds.

While Freedom-2's ink has been approved by the FDA, the administration does not regulate tattoo ink makers. Inks can contain almost anything, even carcinogens, which are cancer-causing elements, Anderson said.

Right now, there only is one ink on the market that has been approved by the FDA, said Matt Goss, tattoo artist for Stray Cat Tattoo.

However, Goss said that he was somewhat skeptical about Freedom-2's new ink. "There is more to tattooing than just putting ink under the skin," he said. "There could be scar tissue. Even with this ink you may still be able to see the tattoo even if the ink isn't there."

Particularly since the ink will not be released for at least a year, Goss said he recommends first taking a look at the inks that already are available.

"There are a lot of different brands of pigments out there," he said. "The important thing is to find a reputable company that's willing to stand behind its product."

Trent Gareis, junior in architecture, has a tattoo of a cross on his back that he got in 2005. He said even with the possibility of easier removal, taking one's time when choosing a tattoo still is important.

"I still think I made the right decision, but I planned for about six months," he said. "People still need to take their time and figure out exactly what they want."

Goss expressed similar sentiments.

"The best thing anybody can do if they think they want something is to wait for six months," Goss said. "With a tattoo, people just need to take their time and be selective, take a look at the artist's portfolio. That way, unwanted tattoos can be prevented."

ROTC | Student soldiers learn how to communicate effectively through tank simulation training program

as close as you can get."

On the inside of the simulators, there were no bright lights. A constant sound of rolling thunder rushed through the ill-lit, small space allowed for each soldier.

As the tank began to roll, the chairs vibrated to simulate movement. The three-dimensional terrain of mountainous desert narrowly could be seen through the 3-inch viewing slot.

"We can drop them into Baghdad, Kosovo, Germany, Fort Carson or Fort Hood any time we want," Naughton said.

"Soldiers come in and train in an exact replica of Baghdad, and some soldiers have recognized the location who've been there before."

Along with identical terrain, other aspects of Baghdad and the war in Iraq can be simulated into training missions.

These aspects include suicide bombers, improvised exploding devices, hostile aircraft and civilians turning into insurgents.

"With the war in Iraq, soldiers have to deal with protestors, IEDs and other elements that are kind of new parts of the game," Naughton said. "We want to get the group as prepared as we can."

During the K-State mission, a battalion of Iraqi tanks was pitted against the Wildcat platoons.

As fighting broke out, certain parts of K-State tanks began to fail.

"Our electronics were taken out," Marietta said.

Naughton said these glitches were actually programmed into the simulation for an increased challenge and reality aspect.

"As a complicated system, they learn to think on their own," Naughton said. "We can force them to be in a compromising situation, like having their antenna knocked off during a battle to knock out communication."

CCTT technicians said tank simulators initially cost more than $1 million dollars, and frequent updates also add to the overall cost. However, Naughton argued that the costs are justified.

"By the time that professional soldiers are out of here, they hit the live targets better, and they know the drill," Naughton said. "If they've learned to do it better, we save money on ammunition, fuel and even lives later on."

The K-State mission was simple – called a movement to contact, the objective was to stay in their newly learned wedge formation until the enemy was found.

Once the enemy was found, the rule of engagement was simple: shoot to kill.

As this was their first experience in tank simulation, cadets were not evaluated for their technical skill. Instead, cadets were evaluated for their reactions to challenges and communication skill.

"One thing we noticed is that at the beginning they had a problem with Army jargon on the radio," said Lt. Col. George Belin, professor of military science. "As the mission went on, they got better. Communication is key, and as they got better, they also began engaging better."

Belin said many cadets will not be positioned in a tank division as a career, but still there were benefits that could be gained during the day's simulation.

Jason Miller, sophomore in business administration and ROTC cadet, makes some adjustments inside a tank simulator Saturday morning at Fort Riley's close combat tactical training center.

"A lot of skills that were practiced today, such as leadership and communication, are transferable to any branch of the army. Plus, it's nice to have a working knowledge of other branches."

Despite having to give up a Saturday, cadets noted their experience on Fort Riley was a rare opportunity, and it was one they were thankful to have.

"Having Fort Riley here is huge," said Mike Weilbacher, battalion commander for K-State ROTC and senior in architectural engineering.

"Most schools don't have this opportunity for some outside-the-box leadership training. We're the only ROTC program in the Midwest who has the partnership with a base that we have with Fort Riley."

ORCHESTRA | Grammy-nominated orchestra plays for 200 Saturday at McCain

McNeely also wrote the song "We Will Not Be Silenced," about the events surrounding Sept. 11.

Remaining down-to-earth was something he strived for, and the awards were for other people to give, McNeely said.

"You can't lose sight of your humanity," he said.

In front of approximately 200 people, the band performed for nearly two hours. There was an intermission between the two sets.

The audience applauded when the brass section began but was drowned out by the music.

On the drums, John Riley provided a subtle background with the use of drum brushes while the different musical instruments each vied for the audience's attention.

The stratification of elements Cochran spoke of was obvious, as the orchestra of trumpets, trombones, saxophones and other brass instruments – as well as a bass and piano – each mixed to provide a wall of sound.

"Up From the Skies," the title track, drew the largest reaction from the fans, with music from the brass section interrupting the flow of the orchestra. Cochran compared the sound to the feeling one gets when ingesting LSD.

"I have the hope that the audience that comes here tonight has a sense of what they are getting," Cochran said.

Justice Department balks at FCC privacy provision

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Federal regulators working on rules to secure the calling records and other private information of telephone customers are running into resistance from phone companies and law enforcement agencies.

The rules, an effort by the Federal Communications Commission to combat "pretexting," are circulating among the commissioners and could be voted on this month.

Pretexting is the practice of impersonating a phone customer to gain access to his phone records. President Bush signed a law last month criminalizing the practice and imposing penalties, including up to 10 years in prison.

The issue gained prominence last year when Hewlett-Packard Co. executives were charged with hiring private detectives who used the technique to investigate board members.

The new law gives police a weapon to punish perpetrators, but it leaves out any requirements for how phone companies should protect their customers' private data. Cell phone bills, for example, can reveal who a person has called and, in some cases, even the caller's location.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin told reporters recently the new rules will require that customers use a password to access their account information.

While that might protect calling data, telephone companies are wary. They fear a password requirement might upset customers.

AT&T Inc. spokesman Michael Balmoris said the company has to be careful to balance security against customers' wishes for easy access to their information.

The rules also are expected to require that phone companies get a customer's permission before they can release information that may be used for telemarketing.

Phone companies contend this requirement would violate their First Amendment right to communicate with customers – a position that a federal court supported in 1999.

Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, called that court decision "probably one of the oddest First Amendment cases in many, many years." Since that case, he said courts have been more inclined to support privacy rules.

Phone companies say there is no evidence that information shared with business partners falls into the wrong hands, making the proposed requirement unnecessary.

The departments of Justice and Homeland Security have taken issue with two other possible provisions in the emerging rules, both of which have privacy advocates concerned.

The first would tell phone companies to destroy customer records as soon as the records no longer are needed for legitimate business purposes. The government wants the records preserved for possible use in criminal investigations.

Secondly, the two departments want phone companies to notify law enforcement officials first, before customers, when customers' private billing information has been disclosed improperly.

In written comments to the FCC, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said immediately alerting customers in such cases may tip off investigative targets and lead them to destroy evidence, change their behavior or slip away.

He proposed that companies not tell customers for at least seven business days after notifying the FBI or the Secret Service.

For companies, this would mean they would have to determine, without the benefit of input from their own customers, whether an unauthorized breach had occurred. Companies also have raised questions about how such a notification system would work.

Consumer advocates are concerned a delay could result in more harm than good.

Jeannine Kenney, senior policy analyst with Consumers Union, said customers should learn immediately when someone is delving into their personal information.

"In fact, failing to notify a customer of a breach could impede prevention of actual harm or the commission of another crime," she said.

Rapper talks about Kansas, future albums

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A few years ago, DJ Unk was DJ Unknown, selling mixed tapes and trying to become a recognized musician. Now he has everyone singing his song and doing his dance.

Q: What is your first impression of Kansas?

A: This is my first time in Kansas. A lot of hicks from Kansas hit my MySpace page up, so I know it's gonna be hype tonight.

Q: What was your first response when you saw people dancing to your music?

A: It's crazy to have people dance to your music, love what you do and love your sound. I'm going to try to keep that going for 2007.

Q: What was the concept for the song "Walk It Out"?

A: The dance was already there. It originated from the Poole Palace (a club in Atlanta). It was called the "bend your knees, rock your hips dance," and I just called the song "Walk It Out" after the dance. Everybody puts their own flavor to it. I just brought something that was going on in Atlanta to the mainstream.

Q: How was your transition from DJ to rapper?

A: The transition was cool — a lot of DJs rock, for one. They love to hide the DJ — everyone loves the DJ — but they have to be behind somebody else. I wanted to bring that to the table, that we (DJs) can do it too (be in the lime-light). At the end of the night, it (being a rapper) helps as far as getting into somebody's head. But I'm just trying to do good music.

Q: With the controversy of southern rap taking over the hip-hop scene and comments of how southern rappers are not real, what is your response be to those comments?

A: Just chill out. It's a new year, a new generation. A lot of kids and teenagers are involved and are growing up. The time's going to change, music's going to change, and sound's going to change.

Q: If you were in college what would you major in?

A: Engineering.

Q: K-State has one of the best engineering schools in the nation, would you come here?

A: I might take a class.

Q: What's next for DJ Unk?

A: My next single off my album is called "2 Step." We are about to shoot the video for that one, this Tuesday or Wednesday, so keep your eyes open.

Now 'Walk It Out'

Students, Manhattan residents meet, dance with DJ Unk

An hour delay put a small kink in the DJ Unk show Saturday night, leading to cancellations. Opening acts, including a sorority step show and the "Walk It Out" dance contest were cancelled.

Daniel "Dank" Martin, show promoter, said there were problems with the sound crew.

"The show started late because the sound man left for an hour," Dank said. "He didn't come back until 8."

The sound crew said no one there for the sound check earlier in the day, and there were some contract agreements to be made before the concert.

Manhattan resident Keith Jones attended the concert to enter the contest, and said it was a publicity stunt.

"The main thing that I came for was the 'Walk It Out' contest ... I knew I was gonna win the $150," he said.

Prior to the show, DJ Unk, who wore a gold jersey with the words "Big Oomp Camp" on the front, stopped to take pictures and sign autographs. More than 50 fans waited in line to see the performer.

Sara Van Allen, marketing manager at the Manhattan Town Center, said they are used to having country acts because of Country Stampede.

"This is a whole different genre. It brings in a lot of traffic," Van Allen said. "We are always happy to have guests."

Danielle Johnson, freshman in agribusiness, said she was excited to see DJ Unk in concert and meet him.

"This is good for K-State. We don't usually get this type of entertainment," she said. "I am glad they are catering to the urban students."

Many K-State students said they were excited to have a chart-topping rapper on campus.

"We found out about the concert yesterday, and we bought our tickets right away," said Megan Stark, first-year student in veterinary medicine. "This is our most excitement all year. We are usually studying."

DJ Unk performed a few cover songs, such as Jim Jones' "Ballin'" and a number of songs from his debut album, "Beatin' Down Yo Block," including "2 Step" and "Walk It Out."

Though the contest was cancelled, DJ Unk asked for about 20 volunteers to come onstage and "walk it out."

The stage was shaking as concert goers bounced around onstage. Raziya Marks, sophomore in print journalism, said she enjoyed being able to dance with DJ Unk.

Local band inspired by well-known country groups

By Eric Brown
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A local country band entered previously unknown territory on Thursday night and met with success.

The Aaron Traffas Band played its first gig at Longhorns Saloon, bringing a sound that resembled the bands whose stickers were featured on bass player Chris Goering's guitar case — red-dirt country groups like Cross Canadian Ragweed and Bleu Edmondson, as well as alternative country ensembles like Son Volt and Uncle Tupelo.

The band played a 33-song, three-hour set for the 75-plus attendees that braved the cold that night, pausing the music only once in order to take a brief group whiskey shot.

The show featured band originals, covers of Robert Earl Keen, Stony Leroux and others and a minute-long, bombastic drum solo by Nathan Powell received an enthusiastic response.

The band convinced a number of the present concert-goers to congregate on the dance floor for a little two-stepping.

During the show, the band members also took time to express their political views through one of their original tunes, which contained the lyrics, "I want to love a Republican, even if we don't agree."

The band's performance followed an opening solo show by fellow band member Dusty Feighner. Following the band's performance at Longhorns, the five-man ensemble performed shows on the road for the remainder of the weekend, traveling to Olpe, Kan., on Friday, and Sun City, Kan., on Saturday.

After the performance-filled weekend, band members now have a break before they play their next gig.

Along with Goering, Powell, and Feighner, band members are Aaron Traffas on lead vocals and guitar and Jimmy Dillinger on lead guitar. The band has been together for about a year and a half, and all members have had previous experience.

As far as the future goes, the band members said they plan to continue exploring new music scenes and spreading their music. The group also is striving to make an album before summer.

"We really just want to keep doing what we do but spread our music to a broader audience," said Goering, who is an instructor in secondary education at K-State and working toward his doctorate. "We also really want to continue creating new material. We want to adventure into new avenues of songwriting and see what we can do as a group."

The band's chief songwriter, Traffas, has a simple method to his writing.

"I've learned that as long as you're honest, nothing else really doesn't matter," Traffas said. "So that's what I'll continue to do."

Lopez to receive human rights award

LOS ANGELES — Jennifer Lopez will receive an award for her work as producer and star of a film examining the murders of hundreds of women in a Mexican border town, Amnesty International officials said Friday.

Lopez will receive the Artists for Amnesty award Feb. 14 at the Berlin Film Festival.

In "Bordertown," Lopez plays a journalist reporting on the serial killings of women in the border city of Juarez, Mexico.

"I began working to ensure we made this film in order to bring the attention of the world to this tragedy and to pressure the Mexican government to bring to justice those responsible for these horrible crimes," Lopez said.

Farrah Fawcett celebrates 60th

LOS ANGELES — Farrah Fawcett got an unbeatable gift for her 60th birthday: a clean bill of health.

The actress, who revealed in October that she was fighting cancer, learned this week that she is cancer-free, spokesman Mike Pingel said Friday.

Dr. Gary Gitnick, Fawcett's lead physician at the University of California, Los Angeles, said the actress "has had a full and complete response to treatment."

"Her prognosis is excellent," he said.

The former "Charlie's Angel" star said she was "deeply grateful" to her doctors and her family and friends "who have sustained me as I battled this terrible disease."

"This is an extraordinarily happy day for me and my family," she said in a statement. "I hope that my news might offer some level of inspiration to others who unfortunately must continue to fight the disease."

Fawcett planned to celebrate her birthday Friday with family and friends, Pingel said, and expects to return to work "in the next month or two."

Fawcett did not disclose the kind of cancer she was treated for. Her ex, Ryan O'Neal, told People magazine she was being treated for anal cancer.

THIS WEEK... A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TODAY 1994: Beckwith convicted of murder

White supremacist Byron De La Beckwith was convicted of the murder of African-American civil rights leader Medgar Evers, more than 30 years after the crime occurred. Evers was gunned down in the driveway of his Jackson, Miss., home on June 12, 1963, while his wife, Myrlie, and the couple's three children were inside.

Beckwith, a fertilizer salesman and Ku Klux Klan member widely believed to be the killer, was prosecuted in 1964. However, two all-white (and all-male) juries deadlocked and refused to convict him. Prosecutor Bobby Dabbs later worked with Myrlie, who later became the first woman to chair the NAACP, to force another prosecution on Beckwith. He died in prison in 2001 at age 80.

TUESDAY 1952: Elizabeth becomes queen

After a long illness, King George VI of Great Britain and Northern Ireland died in his sleep at the royal estate in Sandringham. Princess Elizabeth, the oldest of the king's two daughters and next in line to succeed him, was crowned Queen Elizabeth II on June 2, 1953, at age 27. In 2003, she celebrated 50 years on the throne, only the fifth British monarch to do so.

WEDNESDAY 1964: Beatles arrive in New York

The Beatles first visited the United States and scored their first No. 1 U.S. hit with "I Want to Hold Your Hand." American youth poised to break away from the cultural landscape of the '50s, the Beatles, their music and good-natured rebellion was the perfect catalyst for the shift.

THURSDAY

1943: Americans secure Guadalcanal

Japanese troops evacuated Guadalcanal, leaving the island in allied possession after a prolonged campaign. The American victory paved the way for other Allied wins in the Solomon Islands. Both sides suffered heavy losses of men, warships and planes. An estimated 1,600 U.S. troops were killed, over 4,000 were wounded and several thousand died from disease.

FRIDAY 1971: Paige nominated to Hall of Fame

Pitcher Leroy "Satchel" Paige becomes the first Negro League veteran to be nominated for the Baseball Hall of Fame. In August of that year, Paige, a pitching legend known for his fastball, showmanship and longevity of his career, which spanned five decades, was inducted. Paige retired from the majors in 1953, but returned in 1965 to pitch for the Kansas City A's. He was 59 at the time, making him the oldest person ever to play in the major leagues.

President Clinton to give Landon Lecture

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The decade-and-a-half effort to bring Bill Clinton to K-State has finally ended.

Clinton, the 42nd U.S. president, will present the 148th Landon Lecture at 3:30 p.m. March 2 at Bramlage Coliseum.

While Landon Lecture invitations were sent to Bill Clinton prior to his presidential term, they date back to at least 1993, said Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series. Gov. Kathleen Sebelius helped bring Clinton to K-State, Reagan said.

"We gave her a copy of our invitation, and she said she would get it to the right people and she obviously did," he said.

While admission to the lecture is free, tickets are required upon entry, Reagan said. The ticket distribution time and date will be announced in about one week.

Seating at Bramlage will accommodate 9,500 people, Reagan said.

148th Landon Lecture
Former U.S. President Bill Clinton
Time: 3:30 p.m.
Date: March 2
Place: Bramlage Coliseum

This is the maximum capacity seating available for Landon Lectures at Bramlage, and set-up will be similar to that of President Bush's lecture in January 2006, Reagan said.

K-State students, faculty, staff members and military service members from Fort Riley will have the first opportunity to obtain tickets. The remaining tickets will be distributed to the general public.

"I think any time you can hear a sitting president or a former president speak is important," Reagan said. "They speak with great authority, even when they are out of office. They speak with great influence, and it's important to our public policy."

Since his presidency, Clinton published his autobiography, "My Commissioners to discuss defense facility

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission will discuss a new finance plan for the south portion of the downtown redevelopment project this evening.

The commission also will consider making a financial commitment to improve the city's chances of getting a government research facility.

The south redevelopment project includes plans for the Flint Hills Discovery Center, in addition to a hotel, conference center, parking garage, theater and restaurants. The project includes retail and residential areas, according to city staff.

City staff applied for $41 million from STAR bonds for the plan, but were given $50 million because of changes in the state and community level. STAR bonds are paid off with sales tax revenue.

"This is an opportunity for the city staff to present a new financing plan for the redevelopment project," said Mayor pro tem Tom Phillips.

Some of the money is coming from different sources.

"As a community we will be asked to invest $20 million," Phillips said.

He said some of the money will come from taxes and some will come from the city's general fund.

The commissioners will also decide on a date for a public hearing for the redevelopment project.

The commissioners will also discuss their role in the proposed National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility.

Manhattan is one of 18 possible sites for the NBAF, as is Leavenworth, Kan. The city of Manhattan and K-State are putting together a package to show how Manhattan is a good place for the facility.

"We'll be discussing what we as a community can offer to make our package of incentives attractive," Phillips said.

The NBAF will be a 500,000 square foot facility committed to the development of countermeasures to animal and human diseases, according to city staff. It is expected to employ 250 to 500 researchers and will cost an estimated $450 million.

"The employment is very significant," Diane Stoddard, deputy city manager, said. "It will have very high quality research positions. This will be a great benefit to the state and to Manhattan."

Event marks beginning of week-long celebration of Chinese culture

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student and faculty performers sang, danced and spoke to passersby in the K-State Student Union from noon to 1 p.m. Monday.

A total of five people performed for the Festival of Nations, a monthly event sponsored by the Union Programming Council.

"We do this to help raise awareness of other cultures," said Shea Olsen, graduate adviser for the UPC and graduate student in apparel marketing. "The students have gotten to see a lot of great entertainment."

The UPC also set out traditional Chinese food for the crowd. The food was free and was gone by the end of the one-hour event.

Yi Lu, graduate student in kinesiology, began the event with a Chinese minority dance.

She said the dance is traditional of southern China and is one of 13 varieties of minority dances.

Lu, who has a bachelor's degree in dance, said she has danced since she was 5 years old.

"(The event) is about perfect," Lu said. "Even though we're in the U.S., we can still celebrate."

The event began a week of festivities for the Chinese Spring Festival, a celebration for the Chinese New Year.

Michaela Valdois, senior in history, delivered a speech about traditional Chinese food and customs. She said her professor convinced her to practice the speech for the event before presenting it in its entirety.

"I was kind of nervous, but it was fun," Valdois said.

Valdois studied Chinese for three years and recently visited China. She said the event did a good job portraying Chinese culture.

"We had a pop performance - it's another part of the culture coming in with the young people - but we also had a traditional Chinese song and the piano performance was good," Valdois said.

Xinming Xing followed Lu by singing a traditional Chinese tune; Xiaofan Yang, graduate student in mechanical engineering, performed a piano piece; and Xinxin Chai, graduate student in landscape architecture, sang a more contemporary song to finish the event.

The event was co-sponsored by the Chinese Students and Scholars Association. Jianqin Jenny Yang, the entertainment minister of the association and graduate student in mass communications, said the event was the beginning of a week of Chinese cultural events.

"As globalization becomes prevalent across the world, no matter what the student is doing, they will be better if they can know and understand more cultures," Yang said.

There are about 800 students and faculty members in the CSSA. The biggest reason for the event was to inform students about Chinese culture and celebrations, she said.

"We really want the opportunity to get people to understand the culture and traditions of China," she said.

Yi Lu, graduate in kinesiology, dances in the student union courtyard on Monday. This was part of the festival of nations celebrating the Chinese New Year, this event is sponsored by the UPC.

Poster display in McCain Auditorium represents history of lecture series

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students venturing into McCain Auditorium will walk into a display representing the 40-year history of the Landon Lecture series.

The display, which will be in the north corridor of McCain for most of the spring semester, commemorates the lecture series' 40th anniversary. It also serves to remind people why the series is so prestigious, said Charles Reagan, Landon Lecture coordinator.

"The reason the lecture series is so prestigious is all of the famous people who have (spoken)," Reagan said.

Former K-State president James McCain started the series in 1966 as the Alfred M. Landon Lecture Series on Public Issues, according to the Landon Lecture Web site. It was a tribute to former Kansas Gov. Alfred M. Landon, who delivered the inaugural lecture Dec. 13, 1966.

McCain started the series to ignite political discussions on the issues of the time, said Thom E. Jackson, assistant director of McCain Auditorium, the lecture's main venue.

"It was created to enlighten and educate," he said.

Jackson said he thought the idea of a Landon Lecture exhibit to commemorate the 40th anniversary was a fantastic idea.

"There is a lot of history there," he said. "Most people don't know this history, and it's impressive that we're able to bring that caliber of speakers here."

Jackson said he has received positive responses from people who visited the exhibit, many of whom visit the exhibit before they attend performances at McCain.

He said some of the people who visit the exhibit remember what it was like when the speakers were at K-State.

"There are people who have been there that remember seeing Ronald Reagan or Gerald Ford," he said. "I was young, so I don't remember when Ford was here. But some of the older patrons were sharing what the lecture was about."

Even students who were not alive when some of the speakers were at K-State know the names, because the people were politicians, heroes

Sandra Day O'Connor's Landon Lecture poster is displayed in McCain Auditorium. The poster is one of many which represent some of speakers featured throughout the 40 years of the Landon Lecture series, and will be on display for most of the spring semester.

Douglas Goodin, professor of geography, will present "Hunting the Hantavirus in Paraguay," in the first Vernon Larson International Luncheon Lecture of the spring semester. The lecture is Feb. 12 at the Holiday Inn, 17th Street and Anderson Avenue. The luncheon costs $10.

Engineering students help local charity

Eighteen students from the Department of Architectural Engineering and Construction Science are assisting a local charity with an energy efficiency project. They will conduct energy surveys in the homes of Shepherd's Crossing clients, evaluating homes for energy efficiency and possible renovations.

Presidential approval

A few weeks ago, President Bush's approval rating reached an all-time low of 30 percent. Only four presidents, including Richard Nixon, have scored lower. During his terms, Bill Clinton never scored below 56 percent, even during his impeachment. Here is a comparison of their lowest and highest ratings.

Houlihan's serves many during first day of operation

Josh Gramp, junior in mechanical engineering, and Angela Castronuovo, senior in architectural engineering, eat at Houlihan's Monday afternoon. Monday was the first day Houlihan's was open for business.

By Megan Moser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Only a few patrons occupied Houlihan's restaurant Monday afternoon on its first day open to the public, but by evening the place hummed with activity.

Managers chose not to advertise the opening of the restaurant to allow employees to acclimate to the full 170-person capacity, general manager Shane Allen said.

The franchise, 1641 Anderson Ave., adjacent to the recently remodeled Holiday Inn, is part of a national chain with more than 80 restaurants across the nation, according to the Houlihan's Web site.

Customers feasted on such dishes as pot roast and best-seller stuffed chicken. Appetizers include tuna wontons and bruschetta with goat cheese and focaccia crisps.

Allen said the restaurant makes its food 90 percent from scratch and has a full prep kitchen.

Air Force ROTC instructor Nathan Kaiser and his wife, Lily, dined at the restaurant Monday night. He ordered the mustard-encrusted salmon and she had fish tacos. Both said their food was great.

"I've had fish tacos at The Cheese-cake Factory before," Lily Kaiser said. "These were better."

They also said they enjoyed their $1.99 desserts, strawberry cheesecake and chocolate cappuccino cake.

"I was expecting the desserts to be $5 or $6," Nathan Kaiser said. "When I saw they were so inexpensive, I thought it was some kind of discount."

The couple said their food was delayed, but they expected it for the restaurant's first night.

"It's understandable," Nathan Kaiser said. "They were very nice about it, and the chef came out and apologized. I'm sure in a week or so they'll be going full-force."

Customers also commented favorably on the drink "flights," a choice of three small wines, martinis or margaritas so patrons can sample more than one drink.

"I think we have the best wine and liquor prices in town," Allen said.

As many as 170 employees have trained since Jan. 27, Allen said. He estimated 80 percent of them are K-State students.

Houlihan's replaced Gold Fork restaurant, and the building was completely renovated. Allen said they didn't want the new place to seem anything like Gold Fork.

"The only thing that stayed was the exterior walls and the bar," Allen said.

Too much of a good thing

Both parties' remedies of government expansion harm more than liberate

Republicans and Democrats alike are headed toward the same destination.

Both parties are on the tracks for governmental controls over the individual from cradle to grave; Democrats are in control of a bullet train, while Republicans are directing a non-stop.

Following the November election, Republicans tend to walk around like dogs with their tails tucked between their legs. To this day, they continue to moan and complain about Democrats gaining power in Congress.

The emergence of moderates from both parties is nothing more than the two parties combining. Republicans and Democrats are concerned with the same goals: getting and keeping power.

The key to creating power is manipulating the weakest minds of society and making them feel dependent upon the government.

Governments that are given power eliminate the only threats to their power – private industry and strong-willed individuals.

During the Democratic National Committee's winter meeting, Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., announced her intent to deal with evil oil companies that create large profits at the expense of the American taxpayer.

Her solution was very simple. In her own, clear words she said, "I want to take those profits."

Former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., promised to raise taxes to pay for his $120 billion health care plan.

Now, where I come from, taking something that doesn't belong to you is called stealing – or when taken by the government, taxing.

Those who look to the government to solve the problems of our time are like drug addicts. They are willing to relinquish power to the government and refuse to take responsibility for their actions.

After hitting rock bottom, drug addicts reach what is called a moment of clarity. In this moment, they realize their course of action is destructive, to themselves and those around them.

America has experienced only two moments of clarity in its history, which spawned an attempt by the people to regain their power.

The first opportunity worked, while the other was stifled by an authoritarian government.

The first moment occurred in the lead-up to the American Revolution.

Thomas Jefferson, when drafting the Declaration of Independence, gave the people of the United States strict instruction in handling situations of government oppression.

Jefferson's introduction to the Declaration, "When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bonds which have connected them with another," inspired people to dictate the course of action for the government in which they wish to live.

The second moment of clarity was in the secession of the southern states. Those states recognized the flaws in the government's economic policies of high tariffs on goods from Europe. Tariffs limited the importation and exportation of goods.

Americans believe problems can be fixed by the government, but what happens when the government is the problem? Opportunities exist and present themselves in the middle of adversity.

Democrats in power bring about the change necessary to our government, but not for the better.

Their changes need to inspire citizens to take back this government for the people.

TO THE POINT

An editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

With your help, Collegian editors ready to take plunge

The Collegian has decided to put its money where its mouth is.

This weekend, many costumed good samaritans will brave the icy water of Tuttle Creek for the Polar Bear Plunge in Manhattan.

All proceeds will go to the Special Olympics.

Rather than simply touting the benefits of participating in such a worthy event from a holier-than-thou pedestal, Collegian staffers decided to participate.

After all, there's nothing like jumping into a little 10-degree water to get the blood flowing.

Opinion editor Jonas Hogg and editor in chief Megan Moser will take the plunge this Saturday. There is only one catch: they each have to raise $75 to enter the event.

We appreciate that not everyone is willing to subject their bodies to the wintry elements. However, everyone can help by donating as little as a few dollars to help us reach our goal.

But please, don't discount our request if you have any ill will toward the newspaper.

If you've ever felt that you didn't like something in the Collegian, here's your chance to get back at the people who produce it. We're practically handing ourselves over to you. Plus, you would get the pleasure of watching Megan and Jonas take the plunge.

At the same time, though, you can do your part by making a tax-deductible donation to a reputable nonprofit organization.

To donate, please visit or take money to the Student Publications business office, Kedzie 103. We appreciate your help.

K-State buildings in dire need of work

Ackert, King and Chalmers halls and the Chemistry/Biochemistry Building were shut down due to a steam pipe leak in the power plant on Jan. 24. To fix the pipes, repair crews had to go in with asbestos filtration suits.

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

In a speech to the Senate Higher Education Task Force, K-State President Jon Wefald said we are at a crisis point, and hopefully we can get through the semester with a temporary fix to the aged power plant.

Hopefully. The power plant needs $18 million in repairs, Wefald told the task force, and funding is needed for deferred maintenance costs at K-State as well as other universities funded by the Kansas Board of Regents.

Ralph Richardson, Dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, said if program-threatening problems related to a lack of maintenance developed on the campus of the veterinary medical college, it could lose its accreditation. The last time that was a concern was in the late 1960s.

In the past, Coles, Trotter and Mosier halls were built in response to the lack of acceptable professional college facilities in Leasure, Burt and Dykstra halls, he said.

Imagining K-State without Vet Med would be like the University of Kansas without its medical school.

The buildings at K-State are in horrible need of repair.

From pipes bursting and shutting down heat to the power plant's "Frankenstein room," where workers use a piece of wood and special suits to turn things on and off, K-State ranks worst on the list of Regents universities with buildings in need of repair.

The Kansas Board of Regents Fall 2006 Deferred and Annual Maintenance Report states that about two to four percent of the current replacement value should be allocated each year.

Which means, according to Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance, K-State should receive at least $28 million each fiscal year based on its current replacement value.

Governor Kathleen Sebelius proposed allocating $300 million to the Regents universities over six years to repair campus facilities by raising the tolls on the Kansas Turnpike.

The proposal created a firestorm of Kansas senators crying the plan would place an undue burden on truckers using the turnpike.

Which do they want? The state's universities crumbling into disrepair, or to take responsibility and correct potentially lethal hazards, like the "Frankenstein room?"

The oldest building at K-State was built in 1874, and K-State has more than $235 million in building renewal costs – almost $50 million more than the University of Kansas.

The state of Kansas has become so focused on shoring up funding at the elementary and secondary levels it has forgotten about the universities, especially K-State.

The Regents could at least find a way to pay to upgrade the power plant and cover the exposed wires in Fairchild Hall before someone gets hurt, or worse.

Imagine the publicity for Kansas from something like that.

WORLD NEWS

IRAN ASSEMBLES 2 URANIUM-ENRICHING UNITS UNDERGROUND

VIENNA, Austria — Shrugging off the threat of tougher U.N. sanctions, Iran set up more than 300 centrifuges in two uranium enrichment units at its underground Natanz complex, diplomats and officials said Monday.

The move potentially opens the way for larger scale enrichment that could be used to create nuclear warheads. Iranian leaders repeatedly have said the Natanz underground hall would house first 3,000 centrifuges and ultimately 54,000 machines.

It also poses a direct challenge to the Security Council, which late last month imposed limited sanctions targeting programs and individuals linked to Tehran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs — and warned of stricter penalties within 60 days unless Iran freezes enrichment.

Speaking separately — and demanding anonymity because their information was confidential — a diplomat accredited to the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency and a U.S. official said two "cascades" of 164 centrifuges each have been set up.

IN SWEDEN, WORLD'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER GOES DIGITAL

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — For centuries, readers thumbed through the crackling pages of Sweden's Post-och Inrikes Tidningar newspaper. No longer. The world's oldest paper still in circulation dropped its paper edition and now exists only in cyberspace.

The newspaper, founded in 1645 by Sweden's Queen Kristina, became a Web-only publication Jan. 1. It's a fate many ink-stained writers and readers fear could await many of the world's venerable journals.

"We think it's a cultural disaster," said Hans Holm, who served as the chief editor of Post-och Inrikes Tidningar for 20 years. "It is sad when you have worked with it for so long and it has been around for so long."

Queen Kristina used the publication to keep her subjects informed of the affairs of state, Holm said, and couriers carried the first editions, which were more like pamphlets, posting them on note boards in cities and towns throughout the kingdom.

Today, Post-och Inrikes Tidningar, which means mail and domestic tidings, runs legal announcements by corporations, courts and certain government agencies — about 1,500 a day according to Olov Vikstrom, the current editor.

GERMAN COURT BLOCKS DANISH EXTRADITION OF EX-SS MEMBER

MUNICH, Germany — A German court blocked the extradition to Denmark of a former member of the Nazi SS wanted in the Scandinavian country for the assassination of a journalist in 1943, the court said Monday.

A senior Nazi-hunter in Israel criticized the decision, saying time and old age could not erase guilt for Nazi crimes.

Soeren Kam, an 84-year-old German citizen born in Denmark, was detained at his home in Bavaria in September 2006 on a European arrest warrant. He was released from custody in October pending a ruling on his extradition.

The upper state court in Munich said it blocked his extradition because there was insufficient evidence for murder charges. It said under German law, possible charges of manslaughter had expired under the statute of limitations.

Kam and several others are accused of shooting Danish newspaper editor Carl Henrik Clemmensen to death in Lyngby, a suburb of Copenhagen.

63 DEAD, 20 MISSING AFTER BOAT SINKS OFF CAMEROON COAST

YAOUNDE, Cameroon — An overloaded wooden boat sank in high waves off Cameroon's coast, killing at least 63 people, a government official said Monday. Fifteen passengers were believed to have survived, but at least 20 were missing and feared dead.

The boat, which was sailing along the coast to Nigeria, sank Saturday night near the Cameroonian village of Mabeta, said Peter Itoe, an official of the local Limbe district reached by telephone. He said 63 of the estimated 100 passengers aboard perished and were buried.

"We learnt from the survivors that the boat initially carried some 29 people, but was collecting others along the coast as it sailed toward its destination in Oron, Nigeria," Itoe said. "According to the survivors, who are mainly Nigerians, the boat became overloaded with over 100 persons aboard and four vehicles."

County files suit against state

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Riley County filed suit against the Kansas Department of Corrections last month for more than $200,000 officials said the county should have received.

KDOC has not followed the statutory formula when sending state funds to Riley County, county counselor Clancy Holean said.

"They have not been using that formula, and our suit is basically intended to put them on notice that they need to follow the formula," Holean said. "We're asking that they follow an existing law."

He said the state has not used the correct formula for quite some time.

The statute in question calls for the KDOC to distribute funding to local community corrections departments based on the number of inmates and the number of cases handled by each probation officer.

"It extends back to 2000," Holean said. "We're not saying in every year we didn't get the right amount, but there are enough of them that the amount we are petitioning for comes out to $200,000 plus change."

The county commission discussed the issue at a special meeting in December.

It was shown at the meeting that while the number of cases per probation officer increased every year since 1988, Riley County Community Corrections received less money per probationer each time the budget was reallocated, from $9,000 per probationer in 1982 to less than $1,650 in 2007.

Also, the number of probationary cases per officer jumped from 20 in 2000 to more than 40.

"We've eliminated all kinds of things," said Frank McCoy, director of Community Corrections. "One of the things that sticks out is that we haven't had any overtime funding for many years."

McCoy said not allowing for overtime forced those staff members who work extra, non-traditional hours early in the week to burn off hours before the end of the pay period.

"When you don't have that flexibility, by Friday they have to take off that number of hours," he said.

Not having overtime forced the RCCC to cut a multitude of programs, mainly those that involve non-traditional business hours, McCoy said.

He said the department has conducted drug test on probationers less frequently due to the cuts.

"We used to have life skills classes, working on things like money handling and relationships," McCoy said. "These have been totally eliminated."

"Basically we've gone from being a seven day-a-week, resource-adequate department to a Monday through Thursday service with inadequate resources. We've lost the stability, I think."

The state now has 45 days to answer a request for admission included with the petition.

This request for admission is a series of statements where Riley County asks the state to admit it was not following the statute.

Although Kansas Secretary of Corrections Roger Werholtz declined to comment, his chief legal counsel, Linden Appel, submitted a reply to Riley County's request.

In his reply, Appel said Riley County did not use the current formula to calculate the money owed, instead relying on a 1990s statute which subsequently has been updated.

Also, he noted that funding to all 31 corrections departments statewide is limited by the amount appropriated by legislation.

"Riley County's claim lacks merit, and accordingly, it is respectfully denied," Appel wrote.

If Riley County were to receive judgment in this case, Holean said the money would be put to good use.

"If we were to obtain judgment, the money would be used for the community corrections program," he said.

Riley County Community Corrections is a layer of supervision for more difficult, higher risk probationers.

The RCCC supervises 175 adult probationers and screens nearly 325 juvenile probationers per year, McCoy said. He said they supervise approximately three percent of Kansas' adult probationers and have successfully diverted 121 probationers from prison.

"The main goal of the program is that we provide services that keep people out of jail," McCoy said.

According to the RCCC, keeping probationers out of prison has saved taxpayers money. From 2003 to 2006, the net savings from the Riley County community corrections program has been over $1 million, according to county documents.

Huggins to add spark to KU 'rivalry'

So I was flipping through the pages of the K-State basketball media guide, trying to get a feel for this alleged rivalry between K-State and Kansas.

Let it be known that I'm not a Kansas guy. I have spent 18 of my 20 years living in New York — far, far away from the "Sunflower Showdown," its history and tradition.

It seems there's a lot of talk and a lot of hype surrounding tomorrow night's game between the Wildcats and Jayhawks at Allen Fieldhouse.

Sure, a lot is at stake. The Wildcats are 6-2 in the Big 12 Conference, winners of seven straight and seemingly playing their best ball of the season. The Jayhawks (6-2 Big 12) are ranked in the Top 10 and loaded with talent, and there always are high expectations in Lawrence.

But why is this Big 12 game any different than the others?

"It's the rivalry," I'm told.

And so I glance back at my media guide, staring at the all-time results, all the while scratching my head. Am I missing something? What rivalry?

By my count, Kansas leads the series 170-89. That includes 32 wins in the last 33 meetings since 1994. It seemed like a big discrepancy, so I tried to put together something tangible, something I could see.

I labeled two jars — one "Kansas," the other "K-State." I put 32 marbles in the Kansas jar, one marble in the K-State jar. The marbles spilled out of the Kansas jar and onto the floor.

I wrote down all the scores, added them up and made a bar graph. The average points per game during the 33-game stretch were significantly higher for Kansas (77) than K-State (61).

If conference titles were cows ... OK, maybe you are getting the point. Or maybe you aren't.

Consider this: K-State owns a 47-25 record at Bramlage Coliseum against Big 12 North opponents not named Kansas and has a winning record against each of the teams. Against the Jayhawks, though, the Wildcats are running on empty. Zero wins in 18 tries. Some rivalry.

Coach Bob Huggins, at his introductory news conference last March, defined rivalry better than anybody I've ever come across.

"Somebody told me one time that to have a rivalry, you have to win once in a while," Huggins said. "Otherwise, it's really not much of a rivalry."

Does that mean the Wildcats have failed to compete with Kansas? Well, yes, that's exactly what it means. But I've got a funny feeling about the future of K-State basketball, and something tells me the Wildcats will close the gap against Kansas over the next few seasons.

Not as much because Huggins will improve the talent level at K-State with the players he brings, but because the players on his team will have a winner's mentality — a swagger and a confidence that all good teams possess.

I believe the Wildcats' problems against the Jayhawks have been mental; that the losing streak became too daunting, the task too tall. Huggins won't allow negative thoughts to creep into his players' minds.

"I've never lined up and thought, 'We were going to lose.' I always thought we could figure out a way to win," Huggins said. "The reality is if I don't believe that, (the players) are never going to believe that."

Huggins also believes in playing hard, and he believes that with consistent effort come favorable results. That's how K-State arrived at its 17-6 record, and it will be the staple for Huggins' program moving forward.

And yes, the Wildcats will continue to move forward. They might even get a few wins against the Jayhawks along the way.

Baylor graduate serves Huggins, family as result of bet

By Trenton Clifton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jon Rolph never thought he would wear a K-State jersey over his Baylor T-shirt. Thanks to the Wildcats and coach Bob Huggins, that was indeed the case Monday night.

Rolph, a 2001 Baylor graduate, made a bet with friend and Carlos O'Kelly's manager Jim Wright, a 1984 K-State graduate, about the outcome of the Baylor-K-State men's basketball game.

"Jon informed me that Baylor had won in football and basketball the last time our two teams met, and asked me if I would be interested in a bet," Wright said.

Since K-State won 69-60, Rolph, a Wichita native, traveled to Manhattan and served Huggins while sporting a purple K-State jersey at Carlos O'Kelly's during Huggins' weekly radio show.

"I graduated from Baylor, (Wright) graduated from K-State, and even though I have love for K-State, my blood still runs green and gold," Rolph said. "We agreed that I would have to come here and endure public humiliation and serve coach Huggins."

Wright refused to say what would have happened had the Bears prevailed — "I'm too embarrassed to admit," Wright said.

Through a good part of the game it appeared Rolph would win the bet. Baylor led early in the second half, but thanks to strong defense the Wildcats stayed in the game and eventually pulled out the win.

"When we were 11 points down I was pretty nervous, but when all was said and done, I called Jon up and said 'we will see how good your waiting skills really are,'" Wright said.

Rolph, a former Baylor student body president, said he has been a Bear fan through the good times and the bad.

"I attended every game when I was a student at Baylor, so even though I haven't had a lot to cheer for, I'm still optimistic," Rolph said. "I'm a Cubs fan if that tells you anything — there is always next year."

As far as future bets, Rolph said

After putting on a K-State jersey and saying a few words to the K-State fans at Carlos O'Kelly's, Jon Rolph points down with the "hook 'em horns," referencing the K-State win over Texas Saturday.

this experience won't keep him from standing up for his team in the future.

"I am ready every time," he said.

Wright said he is looking forward to more friendly wagers.

"We have Huggins on our side," he said.

Former assistant bears no ill will

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In 1990, Tim Horton was a first-year assistant coach at Appalachian State, a tiny Division I-AA school in Boone, N.C. That same year, an offensive lineman named Ron Prince signed with Appalachian State via Dodge City Community College.

Sixteen years later, when Prince took over for legendary coach Bill Snyder, he hired Horton to coach K-State's running backs.

After a one-year stint in Manhattan, Horton returned to Air Force, where he spent seven years as an assistant coach. He serves as offensive coordinator under coach Troy Calhoun, who Air Force hired in December to replace longtime coach Fisher DeBerry.

With his Southern drawl and easy-going demeanor, Horton gained a reputation as a top-notch recruiter. The Collegian caught up with Horton between recruiting trips to talk about his new job at Air Force, his time in Manhattan and K-State's off-season coaching changes.

Q. Last season, you were part of the staff that replaced Bill Snyder, a coaching legend here in Manhattan. Do you get a sense of déjà vu as the new coaching staff takes over for coach DeBerry at Air Force?

A. Being on coach Prince's staff and replacing a legend in Bill Snyder is very much the same thing we're doing at Air Force. Coach DeBerry had the same feeling and respect around here that coach Snyder had in Manhattan.

Q. With signing day approaching, it's obviously a really busy time for college coaches. Have you had an opportunity to sit back and reflect on your time at K-State?

A. Not a great deal of time, but the one year I was there will always carry wonderful memories. I grew up a lot as a coach. For someone coach Prince's age, he is so knowledgeable. I grew a great deal in my one year there, not just with Ron but also with the staff that we had. It was a tremendous learning experience for me, especially working with those kids. We had some great kids, and obviously they still do.

Q. Your relationship with coach Prince goes back to your coaching days at Appalachian State. What was it like working for him?

A. I guess the moral of the story is to be nice to your players because they might be your boss someday. (laughs) I don't know what he would say, but I hope he'd say the same thing — I really have a lot of respect for him as a coach and a person. His work ethic is unparalleled. I had those same feelings for him as a player. In some ways, working with him as a coach really wasn't a whole lot different than it was as a player.

Q. Were there any surprises, anything you didn't expect?

A. If you would have told me at the start of the year that we'd be playing a freshman quarterback and a freshman running back, there would have been some surprise there.

I did not know — and I shoulda figured it out going into it — I didn't know what a passionate fan K-State had. When you see 23,000 fans at the spring game and the way the fans traveled to Boulder and the bowl game, K-State has as good a fan as there is in the country.

Q. That said, the opportunity to go back to Air Force as a coordinator must have been on of those offers you couldn't refuse ...

A. It really was. I've really appreciated Ron's approach. I think Ron learned it from (Virginia coach) Al Groh. When you've got a chance to advance in this profession, you've got to take it. I thought it obviously was an advancement, not just in pay, but most importantly in leadership. From a professional standpoint, it was the best thing to do. By being a coordinator, it could open doors.

Q. Some people might be concerned about the fact that four assistant coaches have left the K-State program this offseason. Do you agree with that, or do you view the departures as just part of the business?

A. I think you'd need to look at each individual case. I'm probably just qualified to talk about my case. I know for me, it was a promotion and in no way, shape or form was I trying to get out of K-State. I loved K-State, my family loved K-State. How could you not like Manhattan? For Tim Horton, it was a promotion.

FBN | Super Bowl ratings on par with last year's numbers

NEW YORK — The Indianapolis Colts were a winner in the ratings, too, with preliminary measurements indicating the Super Bowl was watched by roughly 90 million viewers, about the same as last year's contest.

The Colts' 29-17 victory over the Chicago Bears recorded a 42 rating and 63 share in Nielsen Media Research's measurement of the 55 largest television markets. Last year's game between the Pittsburgh Steelers and Seattle Seahawks had a 42.2 rating and 62 share.

Final viewership estimates for the country as a whole were due later Monday.

The Steelers-Seahawks matchup was seen by an estimated 90.7 million people last year, the largest Super Bowl audience in a decade.

A ratings point represents 1,114,000 households, or 1 percent of the nation's estimated 111.4 million TV homes. The share is the percentage of in-use televisions tuned to a given show.

This year's game was seen on CBS, a division of CBS Corp.

WRE | Valentine wrestlers cleared of herpes suspicions

OMAHA, Neb. — Examinations of Valentine High School wrestlers showed no evidence of herpes Monday, said Rick Hesse, the school's athletic director.

Valentine was named last week as a possible source of a herpes gladiatorum outbreak that forced an eight-day suspension of high school wrestling in Minnesota. The moratorium ends Tuesday. At least 24 wrestlers in Minnesota came down with the mild form of herpes.

Officials linked the virus to a December tournament in Rochester, Minn.

Steve Patton, the tournament chairman, told the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press that a wrestler from Valentine initially was identified as a possible carrier, but he said there was no proof. Two of the three teams Valentine wrestled in Rochester reported herpes cases.

Hesse said his school barred skin-to-skin contact in practice for two days last week as wrestlers were examined.

Two wrestlers were held out of this past weekend's Southwest Conference meet — one for ringworm, the other for a patch of dry skin. Other injuries reduced Valentine's roster for the meet to four wrestlers. The team finished third in the meet.

Hesse said he's been deluged with calls since Valentine was named as a possible source for herpes. Most of those calls came from schools whose teams previously wrestled against Valentine.

Hesse said it was "grossly irresponsible" for Patton to publicly disclose his suspicions about Valentine.

Intramural referees sometimes brave athletes' ire

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nearly every day, Mark Nelson, senior in philosophy and geography, gets his workout running up and down the basketball court during a game. He never scores, yet some might argue he is the most important part of the game.

He is an intramural referee.

Nelson is one of 150 to 200 intramural referees employed throughout each school year at Peters Recreation Complex.

Though officiating takes away his opportunity to play, Nelson said his love for basketball is what pushed him to become a referee.

"I've always been a passionate basketball player, but I've never been that good," he said. "When I came to K-State, I decided to become an official, so I could stay in the sports I love."

During this time of year, you will find Nelson and other intramural officials running beside players on the basketball court, wearing black shirts with whistles on the back.

"My goal for every game is to be fair, be consistent and be understanding," Nelson said. "I believe it is important for officials to communicate with the players."

Like Nelson, intramural referee Jody Kelly, sophomore in pre-physical therapy, said she tries her hardest to make every game fair, but she also works toward another goal.

"I try not to make people mad at me," Kelly said. "I still kind of get upset when people yell at me, but I'm working on it."

Kelly said the fear of angry players can make her job nerve-racking at times, especially when officiating a men's game.

"I think it's a little scarier to ref guy's games for me, because they're so big," she said. "Also, guys seem to get more into it, and they are really competitive. Sometimes they will complain a little bit."

Nelson said he agrees competitiveness definitely is present during intramural games, but for him, it is part of the fun.

His most memorable officiating experiences include games when fans and players were passionate about the game and about winning. He said he finds this level of enthusiasm less common in softball, volleyball and soccer.

"Basketball and flag football seem to be much more competitive, because they are more fast paced," Nelson said. "People put more energy into them. There's more adrenaline."

Nelson said dealing with angry players helps him learn skills for the future like working with people and communicating on different levels.

"I've learned that, as long as we respect them as opposed to acting superior because we're refs, they won't

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Talking to team captains, Clay King, sophomore in open option, discusses grievances from the first half of an intramural basketball game Monday night. The refs also spoke to the captains before the game to establish general possession and layout rules.

gripe," he said. "I've also learned skills for dealing with pressure and stress."

"As an official, you're always under the heat of the clock, the heat of the fans and the heat of the players."

Like Nelson, Kelly said she takes experiences from officiating and applies them to her every day life. Officiating changed how Kelly views different things.

"When I was in high school playing sports, I looked at the ref and complained a lot," she said. "I just wasn't as sportsmanlike as I should have been."

"Now that I'm refing, I can put myself on the other side and see how a ref feels."

I can do this for other things, too."

While the referees gain multiple skills and experiences from each game, the players also benefit from the referees.

Officials are important to the game's quality, said John Wondra, assistant director of recreational services.

The officials help provide a fair and safe atmosphere for competition, which is what makes them an important part of the game. This job is not as easy as it looks.

"Always appreciate your official during a basketball game," Nelson said. "It's really hard to put the uniform on and get in front of people."

Up 'til Dawn to hold Valentine's Day card writing event to help St. Jude's

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's Up 'til Dawn program is sponsoring a Valentine's Day card-writing party today in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

Up 'til Dawn president Elizabeth Chandler said the event will take place from 6-9 p.m.

"We sent out e-mails to participants, but anyone is welcome to attend," Chandler said.

She said participants will make cards to give to the children of St. Jude's Children's hospital.

"It's a great way to let the kids know we're thinking of them and helping them out, besides just donating money," Chandler said. "We usually do a holiday card writing party, but this is the first year we've done one for Valentine's Day."

Participants are welcome to bring their own supplies to make the cards, but she said organizers will have supplies available for use, and also will be giving away prizes to those in attendance.

"It's just a great way to help out and brighten these kids' day," Chandler said.

The mission of Up 'til Dawn is to unite the K-State community through shared goals of hope, compassion and awareness in collaboration with St. Jude's Children Research hospital to fight and cure childhood diseases, according to the Up 'til Dawn Web site.

Charles Reagan said the exhibit is for former, as well as current, students to take advantage of.

"It's a reminder for people who have been to former Landon Lectures," he said. "It's also information for new people about history."

While there are only posters for Landon Lecture speakers through the past 20 years, Reagan said there are photographs from the earlier years of the series.

The photographs include Landon, also former President Ronald Reagan, former vice president Hubert Humphrey, former President Richard Nixon, former CBS correspondent Dan Rather and former presidential candidate Robert Kennedy.

Jackson said students should visit the exhibit to reflect on the social and political climate of when the speakers were here.

"All students owe it to themselves to spend five minutes," he said. "They can reflect upon what the world is like and what it might be going to."

CLINTON | Former president to speak at K-State

Life," in 2004. He also created the William J. Clinton Foundation with the mission "to strength the capacity of people in the United States and throughout the world to meet the challenges of global interdependence."

Clinton served as president from 1993-2001. Prior to his presidency, he was elected Arkansas attorney general without opposition in 1976, and served as Arkansas governor from 1978-1980 and 1982-92.

In 1998, Clinton was the second U.S. president to be impeached by the U.S. House of Representatives. He was tried in the Senate and found not guilty of the charges brought against him.

Before the announcement yesterday, Clinton was the only U.S. president since Richard Nixon who had not given a Landon Lecture.

Since the Landon Lecture Series' start in 1966, six U.S. presidents and three foreign presidents have presented Landon Lectures.

Coincidentally, there were no Landon Lecturers at K-State in 1998 due to Clinton's impeachment and public figures' hesitancy to leave Washington, D.C., Reagan said.

Aaron Apel, Young Democrats president, said he almost fell out of his chair during class when he heard his childhood idol is delivering a Landon Lecture.

"I was absolutely ecstatic," Apel, senior in philosophy, said. "He's someone I've looked up to since I was younger, and he's someone that's made me want to get into politics. Everything that I've done in politics has stemmed from his inspiration."

Apel said he encourages students of different political affiliations to attend the lecture.

"It'll be a good lecture because he's probably not going to focus on just politics but also some of his activities in philanthropies," Apel said. "There are a lot of misconceptions on who he is as a person and the fact is that he was such an important edition in the history of the United States. It's important just taking that all in and making your own firsthand judgment."

Ben Davis, president of the College Republicans, said he also plans to attend.

"I think it's great that at the university level, we can bring in high-stature speakers," Davis, junior in political science, said. "I don't think we should deny anyone to come and speak, whether or not we agree with him or disagree."

Regardless of political affiliations, Davis said hearing Clinton speak is being a part of history.

"He led this nation, and whether or not you agree, it's a real opportunity to get to see him speak," he said. "I think it's privilege to see him."

"You may learn something new, and if not, you get to see the 42nd president of the United States."

As an elder statesman in U.S. politics, Clinton has a wealth of information about different public policy issues, said Joe Aistrup, head of the Department of Political Science.

"As with any Landon Lecture, K-State has always treated them with respect and dignity," Aistrup said. "Just as we showed the 43rd president, George W. Bush, respect and dignity, we should also show the 42nd president respect and dignity."

Giuliani takes step toward candidacy

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Washington, D.C. — Rudolph Giuliani, the former New York City mayor whose popularity soared after his response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, moved closer Monday to a full-fledged campaign for the Republican presidential nomination.

In a sign that he's serious about running for the White House, he filed a "statement of candidacy" with the Federal Election Commission, indicating he would run as a Republican should he decide to go forward.

"Today, we just took another step toward running for president," Giuliani told reporters in Long Island, N.Y., while campaigning with a state Senate candidate. "It's a big step, an important one. Quite honestly, we're probably ahead of schedule. We still have to think about a formal announcement and how to do it, but this is a pretty strong step." Unlike his chief GOP rivals, Sen. John McCain and Mitt Romney, Giuliani has been ambiguous about whether he will pursue the Republican nomination, even though he has taken the initial steps.

In recent weeks, Giuliani's cautious and noncommittal attitude has caused some critics to question whether he would abandon his bid even before formally entering the race, as he did in 2000 when he was considering a Senate campaign against Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton.

But Giuliani has started to sound and act like a strong contender, traveling to the early primary states of New Hampshire and South Carolina and arguing that his vision for the future and performance in the past would make him a formidable nominee.

SEX ED

Sexual health advice

Education key to sexual health

By Pheasant Weber

SEXUAL HEALTH AWARENESS PEER EDUCATORS

Four people are born every second, according to the Population Reference Bureau. With this overwhelming fact, I have concluded that every second there are four sets of people having unprotected sex or experiencing a contraceptive malfunction.

Think about how many people are engaging in sexual activities that don't result conception every second, including masturbation, oral, anal and vaginal sex.

Interesting to think about, huh? Sex is everywhere. In every town, city and country, through media and advertising, sex has a booming effect on the economy — sex-enhancing drugs and pornography are just a few examples.

The Census Bureau states that the world's population is now at 6.5 billion people, and nearly every single one of those people is here because of sex. Sex affects us all in some way, even if we aren't engaging in sexual activities.

Why the taboo? Why are condoms "scandalous?" The most important question of all: Why is sexual education not a priority?

The Federal government promotes abstinence-only education, which does not include information concerning birth control or sexually transmitted diseases. I am not saying abstinence is not a good thing, yet without education on factual information about STDs and birth control, when people do decide to become sexually active, they will be uninformed.

The Guttmacher Institute recently did a series of surveys and found that "by age 44, 99 percent of respondents had had sex, and 95 percent had done so before marriage." Even among those who abstained from sex until age 20 or older, 81 percent had premarital sex by age 44.

Sex is a resounding theme throughout music, art, movies, advertisements, Mardi Gras, "Girls Gone Wild" — will the list ever end? Yet, when sexual education is brought up, funding and interest is cut short. I don't understand it. I never will.

Statistics seem to irritate people (even though they continue to get worse). The American Social Health Association states that more than half of all people will have an STD at some point in their lives. According to Swarthmore Medical Center in Swarthmore, Penn., the United States has the highest rate of STD, HIV and teen pregnancy rate of any industrialized nation in the world.

Still, there is hypocrisy in this country. We see HIV and AIDS as a problem in Africa, although seven people per hour are infected with HIV here.

For some, sex education isn't appropriate for schools. How can we ignore the biology of our sexual desires, the spread of disease in our youth and the ignorance about transmission?

Young people are receiving mixed messages about sex from the media, and public institutions confuse them more with abstinence-only messages, turning sex into a taboo topic.

My final message is this: protect yourself and know your status.

'Venus in Furs' art show spotlights K-State women

By Megan Molitor

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students showcased their artwork at the "Venus in Furs" exhibit at Varney's art gallery. The exhibit opened Friday and runs through Feb. 24.

The exhibit features the works of female students who expressed themselves through a variety of mediums, including photography and painting.

James Taylor, art instructor at Varney's and gallery manager, said the women-only show featured eight artists, who were picked through an invitation process.

"The show is kind of a rehash of a show that was done at Sisters of Sound," Taylor said. "It was fun; there were a lot less rules there then there are here. It gave students a great opportunity."

"At Varney's, there are more regulations and guidelines we have to follow."

Taylor said he had to edit some of the work for nudity and other explicit content, which is why the participation number was kept at eight.

"There were a lot of artists at other shows we saw that had really good work," he said. "But since there are children and other people that see the work, we weren't able to include a lot of the material."

Jennifer Mosier, senior in Spanish, brought a series of six photographs to the show.

Three were black-and-white prints, which she said she did in her photography 1 class.

Various photographs by Jen Mosier, senior in modern languages, were featured in the exhibit. The show featured female artists who worked in a variety of mediums.

"It was neat learning all the new techniques," Mosier said. "It's a fading trend, since everything is going digital, but I loved learning to understand the film."

The photos included a self portrait, an alphabet project and a documentary project.

She also made available three color photographs for display that she took at the Arbroath Abbey ruins in Scotland, when she was there on an art trip.

"They were pictures of stuff we don't have here, and they date so far back in history," Mosier said. "That's why I found them to be so interesting."

Mosier participated in the Sisters of Sound show and was later contacted to participate in the Varney's show.

Other participants, like Rebecca Sundermeier, senior in fine arts, also chose to include art pieces featuring photography for display.

Sundermeier brought two black-and-white, sepia-toned prints shot with a Holga camera.

"The pictures are from a landscape series I was working on," Sundermeier said. "One was taken outside of town; the other was taken north of Topeka."

Her goal was to make people think about what they see every day, she said.

"I wanted to portray the importance of stopping and looking at things that people see on a daily basis, but do not appreciate," she said.

Sundermeier said she always has enjoyed art and has shown in the gallery a few times.

"I got involved through James, and I was part of the Art Student Council," she said.

Houlihan's offers fancy cuisine at lower price

Houlihan's

Restaurant review by Eileen Laux

In Manhattan, there are few places that offer a nice meal and encourage good conversation. Now, there is one that offers great food and great atmosphere.

Houlihan's, 17th and Anderson Avenue, opened Monday. This might not mean much to some because restaurants of a higher caliber come with a higher price tag. However, Houlihan's provides a change and offers top cuisine at an affordable price.

The menu, bound with a metal cover, gives a fun and cutting-edge feel. It's to read, with interesting drawings and facts throughout the pages.

I started with a mini martini flight, featuring a choice of three mini martinis for $6.25. The three flavors — blue moon, guavtini and adam & eve — were a tasty treat to the start the meal and had a sweet flavor.

Appetizers included the tuna wontons, which were seared perfectly. The spinach dip and stuffed mushrooms were different from what I've tasted at other establishments, and I particularly enjoyed the cheesy stuffed mushrooms.

The BBQ chicken pizza didn't have a distinct flavor and was a little heavy on the onion, which is a vegetable I dislike, so I wouldn't order it again. Spicy Thai BBQ shrimp lit mouths on fire at our table and was difficult to maneuver off the cabob.

Moving on to entrees, the stuffed chicken breast was mouth-watering and well done. The best entree was the down-home pot roast, which was perfectly tender in a mushroom wine sauce paired with mashed potatoes. This I would go back and order again.

Now on to the desserts — and no, I didn't eat this all by myself because they probably would have had to pump my stomach — which featured the "Fab Five," a cappuccino cake with a chocolate ganache and a dollop of ice cream, vanilla creme brule, tri-berry cobbler, Snickers ice cream with an Oreo bottom and cheesecake.

The Snickers dish was a little overwhelming and wasn't my favorite and the cappuccino cake was somewhat dry and lacked a strong coffee flavor.

The cheesecake was wonderful, however. It was reversed, with the crust on top, and in more of a dome shape than a slice.

The creme brule was light and delicious, and the berry cobbler provided a great flavor.

Overall, the atmosphere and food were great. There were some items I didn't care for, but everyone's palate is different.

If you're looking for a place to have a drink with your friends, a date with a significant other or just to have some good food and a great experience, Houlihan's is here for your enjoyment.

"Flags of Our Fathers"

In February 1945, one of the fiercest battles of the Pacific theater of World War II occurred on the tiny island of Iwo Jima. Early in the battle, an American flag is raised atop the high point, Mount Suribachi, and a photograph of the raising became an American cause celebre. The three surviving flag raisers, Rene Gagnon (Jesse Bradford), John Bradley (Ryan Phillippe) and Ira Hayes (Adam Beach), are whisked back to civilization to help raise funds for the war effort. Each must come to terms with the honors, exploitation, and grief they face simply for being in a photograph.

"Hollywoodland"

Actor George Reeves, the heroic Man of Steel on TV's Adventures of Superman, dies in his Hollywood Hills home. Felled by a single gunshot wound, Reeves (Ben Affleck) leaves behind a fiancée, Leonore Lemmon (Robin Tunney) — and millions of fans who are shocked by his death. The Los Angeles Police Department closes the case, but private detective Louis Simo (Adrien Brody) is hired. Simo soon ascertains that Reeves had had a torrid affair with Toni Mannix (Diane Lane), the wife of ruthless MGM studio executive Eddie Mannix (Bob Hoskins).

"Flicka"

Sixteen-year-old Katie McLaughlin (Allison Lohman) claims a wild horse, who she names Flicka, as her own in an effort to prove to her father (Tim McGraw) that she is capable of one day taking over the family ranch.

"Running with Scissors"

Young Augusten Burroughs (Joseph Cross) absorbs experiences that make for a shocking memoir: the son of an alcoholic father (Alec Baldwin) and an unstable mother (Annette Bening), he's handed off to his mother's therapist, Dr. Finch (Brian Cox), and spends his adolescent years as a member of Finch's bizarre extended family.

"The Science of Sleep"

Following the death of his father in Mexico, Stéphane Miroux (Gael García Bernal), a shy, insecure young man, agrees to come to Paris to draw closer to his widowed mother Christine (Miou-Miou). He lands a boring job at a calendar-making firm and falls in love with his charming neighbor Stéphanie (Charlotte Gainsbourg). But conquering her is no bed of roses for the young man and the only solution he finds to put up with the difficulties he is going through is escape into a dream world.

Lafene sports med director remembered

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A memorial for the man who established and directed Lafene Health Center's Ericksen Sports Medicine Clinic is today.

Dr. Guy M. Smith died Saturday due to illness at age 61.

Smith's career with Lafene Health Center began in 1980. Lannie Zweimiller, director of the student health center, said he remembers Smith as an easy person to work with, who always put students first.

"He was a really fun guy to be around, but at one point or another he could get real serious," Zweimiller said.

"He was really interested in quality medicine and taking care of the students."

Smith's daughter, Phoebe Smith, said her father was passionate about treating athletes. He was involved with K-State athletics and traveled regularly with the football team.

Establishing the sports medicine clinic was a way to ensure appropriate resources for treating sports injuries, she said.

The sports clinic is part of the student health center and treats students with injuries to their muscular and skeletal systems.

"There are a lot of injuries along those lines because our student body is pretty active," Zweimiller said. "This allows us to have a place where they can go and their injury can be focused in on."

Smith was a passionate bird-watcher, Phoebe said.

The Guy M. Smith Memorial Birdwatcher Fund exists in his honor and will establish a wetland habitat for birds at Tuttle Creek State Park.

"Hopefully that will increase species of birds and people will enjoy that," Phoebe said.

The memorial is from 3-7 p.m. today at the Deep Creek Community Schoolhouse.

A special toast in Smith's honor will be at 5:30 p.m.

Michael Leahy, a former pornography addict, speaks to attendees about pornography during the question-and-answer portion of a lecture, "Porn Nation," Tuesday evening in McCain Auditorium.

Reformed addict shares thoughts on dangers of porn

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Michael Leahy was 11 years old when he saw his first pornographic image, a topless woman on the back of a playing card.

Years later, as a husband with two young children, Leahy faced a devastating realization: he was addicted to pornography.

"Somehow, somehow, I started to lose control," Leahy said. "I crossed this invisible line where I couldn't stop."

Leahy told his story to a crowd of nearly 500 people in a presentation titled "Porn Nation" at McCain Auditorium on Tuesday night.

In addition to discussing his personal struggles, Leahy spoke about the prevalence of pornographic images in the media.

"Those images have a tendency to stay with you," Leahy said. "Anything like pornography has a message to it, which is objectification."

"Even casual consumption contributes to things like body image issues, eating disorders and self-hatred."

Leahy, who is divorced, said his sexual addiction culminated in an extramarital affair. The former college football player and student body president now travels to campuses across the country, speaking about the dangers of pornography.

"This is something that affects every student," said Leahy, who has appeared on "20/20" and "The View."

"Everyone is exposed to these 14,000-plus sexual images and messages every year in our mainstream media," he said.

Leahy said 12 to 16 percent of college students suffer from what he calls "sex syndrome," a physiological addiction to sexual stimuli. He also quoted statistics from www.mysexsurvey.com, a Web site that supplements his Porn Nation presentation.

Leahy said of the more than 250 K-State students who took the survey, 66 percent reported regularly viewing sexually explicit material in print or online.

"These messages and these images are being push-marketed on us," Leahy said. "They're being forced on us through every imaginable means, from video game characters to clothes to lyrics in music to chatroom conversations."

"We're becoming more and more pornographic in our culture."

This was Leahy's second visit to K-State. The first was three years ago when he debated the merits of pornography with adult film star Ron Jeremy.

Ryan Smith, campus minister with Campus Crusade for Christ, remembered the buzz generated by the debate and wanted to bring Leahy back to K-State.

"I remember seeing the ballroom absolutely packed out," said Smith, who coordinated Leahy's return trip. "The interest that it generated showed this issue is very prevalent in our society and a big issue for a lot of people."

Graduation applications due Thursday

Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Seniors planning to graduate in May have until Thursday to turn in their applications for graduation.

The applications are available in the office of the dean of each college and must be returned to the college from which a student will receive his or her major.

Although graduation is more than three months away, colleges have to start work now to make sure students can get their diplomas on time, said Mollie McReynolds, administration specialist for the College of Arts and Sciences.

As the largest college at K-State, the College of Arts and Sciences expects about 800 students to receive diplomas this year, McReynolds said.

Each college goes through the applications slightly differently, but the basic steps are the same, McReynolds said.

After students in the College of Arts and Sciences turn in their applications, McReynolds enters all of the names into a database and another employee checks to see if students have met all the needed requirements. Carbon copies of the application are divided and sent to the Registrar's Office for diploma orders, to the students' advisers and to the students.

Emily Rosen, senior in social sciences, turned in her application last week after her roommate reminded her the deadline was approaching.

"It was kind of bittersweet because I'm ready to be done with my classes, but I'm not ready to graduate," she said.

During her last semester, Rosen is going to spend time with her friends and enjoy herself.

"I think I just want to make it the best it can be," she said.

If a student turns in an application and is not approved, he or she will receive a letter to contact his or her adviser or the dean's office.

That is why an early application deadline is an advantage, McReynolds said.

"At least it gives them a little leeway to maybe add a course later," she said.

Students who miss the deadline still will be able to graduate in spring, but they might have to do a little more work.

Students in the College of Arts and Sciences who apply late are required to include a letter from their adviser stating why the application was late, McReynolds said.

If an application is received too late, that student's name might not be listed on the commencement program. However, the student still will be able to participate in commencement. The ultimate cutoff date to receive a diploma for a spring graduate is May 31. That is the same day all transfers and incomplete work must be finalized.

McReynolds said May graduates can expect to receive their diplomas in the mail in mid-July.

Up 'Til Dawn group makes cards for kids at St. Jude's

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Red and pink paper hearts covered the tables in the K-State Student Union Ballroom during the first Up 'Til Dawn Valentine's Day card writing party benefiting St. Jude Children's Research Hospital on Feb. 6.

"These cards are unique, because they are straight for the kids," said Brad Scheu, UTD executive board member and senior in economics. "It's just not a monetary donation - the cards are something the kids can hold in their hand."

Participants in the UTD program created Valentine's Day cards using paper doilies, colored markers and scrapbooking scissors. The cards will be sent to St. Jude in Memphis, Tenn. Scheu said participants wrote their own messages inside the cards.

"The personal message shows the kids in St. Jude's that there is a person in college who is thinking about them," Scheu said. "It says a lot of people are supporting the kids, and they're not doing this alone."

Scheu said in the past UTD had a Christmas card-writing party, and the spring felt empty with just the final event.

"So we wanted to spread it out more for the participants involved," Scheu said. "I think it went really well considering the past history of the Christmas card party. We didn't

DIVERSIONS

A waste of time — but you might learn something
Politically jaded computer viruses

Illustration by Elvis Achelpohl | COLLEGIAN

AL GORE VIRUS

■ Claims it is the Internet
■ Causes your computer just to keep counting and recounting

BILL CLINTON VIRUS

■ Compels you to cut wasteful government spending
■ At the same time it compels you to hop into an airplane for a $200 haircut at taxpayer expense

BUREAUCRAT VIRUS

■ Divides your hard drive into hundreds of little units, each of which does nothing, but all of which claim to be the most important part of your computer

CONGRESSIONAL VIRUS

■ Computer locks up
■ Screen splits vertically with a message on each half blaming the other side for the problem

DEMOCRAT VIRUS

■ Doesn't allow you to delete inefficient programs or wasted disc space
■ If you try, it accuses you of being a "mean-spirited extremist"

GEORGE W. BUSH VIRUS

■ Doesn't do anything, but you won't be able to get rid of it until November

HILLARY CLINTON VIRUS

■ Sets the "hidden" attribute on all your accounting files and tells you your computer won't run in 2004 or 2008
■ Many experts believe this virus may become its most dangerous in 2008

JESSE JACKSON VIRUS

■ Warns you repeatedly not to reproduce illegitimate files
■ Meanwhile, it's reproducing illegitimate files in the background
■ If you don't have a color monitor displaying 32-bit true color, it floods your screen with icons and threatens to shut you down

KEN STARR VIRUS

■ Developed in the 1990s at considerable government expense
■ Claims to work on one task but can quickly switch functions when the first process bogs down

LEFT-WING-DRIVEL VIRUS

■ Deletes all monetary files, but keeps smiling and sending messages about how the economy is going to get better

MONICA LEWINSKY VIRUS

■ A low-level virus that enters restricted parts of your system 36 times yet there's no record of it
■ When it runs, it has no improper relationship with your computer's executive software yet its effectiveness is somehow diminished

RALPH NADER VIRUS

■ Not harmful per se, but perfectly willing to let your system crash just to "teach you a lesson"

REPUBLICAN VIRUS

■ Sells off your system resources to the highest bidder

RUSH LIMBAUGH VIRUS

■ Probably the most dangerous virus ever because you fail to take it seriously until it's too late

Yoga offers other approach to nonviolence

Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Downward facing dog, cat, cow and tree. These sound like something one would find at a farm. But think again.

It's Noontime Yoga from noon to 1 p.m. every Monday through Wednesday in Ahearn Field House 301.

Noontime Yoga is a part of the K-State Women's Center Campaign for Nonviolence.

YogaFit instructor Carol Gould said she helped bring yoga to the Campaign for Nonviolence and has taught the classes ever since.

"When we started, the intent was to have the classes during the Season for Nonviolence, but people liked it so much, it's just kept going," Gould said.

Noontime Yoga began with just two classes offered a week. Its popularity grew and expanded into five classes per week, but students and members of the community still wanted more, Gould said.

The program was extended into summer and is now offered year round.

K-State Women's Center Director Susan Allen said the goal of Noontime Yoga is to get in touch with oneself in order to achieve the goals of nonviolence.

"By focusing on your breathing, you let everything else go," she said. "People tend to think of global war and peace when it comes to nonviolence, but it's way more than that. It's all levels of our lives. Yoga is at that very basic level."

The Noontime Yoga staff is composed of six YogaFit instructors who provide multiple levels of skill.

Classes are free for any K-State student or community member who wishes to attend. Women and men are welcome. However, students can make a tax-deductible donation to thank the instructors.

"You don't have to be able to fold yourself up like a pretzel," Gould said. "Anyone can do yoga."

Exercises like the downward facing dog are designed to improve circulation, stimulate abdominal organs, and put pressure on the glandular system of the body, ultimately resulting in better health.

The program is in its fifth year as a part of the K-State Women's Center Campaign for Nonviolence.

The CNV began seven years ago with an overall goal to promote a safe and respectful community that is equitable for all citizens.

According to the CNV Web site, the program is a growing affiliation of women and men from all sectors of the community.

These men and women share the realization that building a safe community and peaceful world begins with understanding that nonviolence starts with the individual.

Allen said the CNV looks at nonviolence anthropologically, not just focusing on stopping violence but changing the culture that produces it.

"We can't just change society," she said. "We have to start with ourselves."

Allen said one must start by trying to become a more balanced and healthier person.

"Nutrition and physical balance; that is what yoga is for," Allen said.

Traudel Watters began practicing yoga in 2001 and followed Gould to Noontime Yoga in 2002.

She enjoys attending the classes because she said it is a good way to stay strong in mind and body.

Yoga mats are preferred, but not required. People may pur-

Commission promises to allocate funds toward bio, agri-defense facility

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission made a financial commitment for a potential biological and agricultural research facility Tuesday evening in hopes of increasing the odds it will be built here.

Commissioners voted unanimously for a resolution committing the city to pledge up to $5 million for the infrastructure of the National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility. The resolution means the city pledges aid to the federal facility in the event Manhattan is chosen for it.

"This NBAF fits perfectly with our economic development goals" mayor Bruce Snead said.

Manhattan is one of 18 possible sites for the proposed NBAF. Leavenworth, Kan., is another possible site. The $450-million facility would be used to research human and animal diseases and is expected to employ 250 to 500 scientists.

"The economic impact of a facility of this nature in our community is off the chart," said Lyle Butler, president of Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce.

One reason Manhattan is being considered for the facility is because of the presence of the Biosecurity Research Institute in Roberts Hall. The NBAF would be constructed in the open land just north of the BRI.

The NBAF will be similar to the BRI, said Ron Trewyn, vice provost for Research.

"This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to attract a federal research facility to the state of Kansas," Trewyn said.

The proposal deadline for the NBAF is Feb. 16, according to city staff.

The commission also discussed the south downtown redevelopment project and voted unanimously to set March 15 for a public hearing to consider its adoption.

The south end project area is located south of Pierre Street, east of Fourth Street, and west and north of Fort Riley Boulevard. It will include the Flint Hills Discovery Center, a hotel, parking garage, public park, conference center, theater, restaurants, businesses and residential areas, according to city staff.

Mike Conkwright of Bud's Auto Service said he was excited about the project was concerned that his 50-year-old family-run business was not being offered an new location that is adequate.

"We realize what's good for Manhattan is good for us," Conkwright said.

Mayor pro tem Tom Phillips said negotiations still are possible and urged Conkwright to keep working with Dial Realty, the company behind the redevelopment, and the city.

"My advice is to keep the doors open and keep negotiating," Phillips said.

TO THE POINT All habits can become addictions

At press time, the Collegian editors were not able to think of a positive addiction.

Of course there are negative ones: nicotine, alcohol, gambling.

But aside from those, even addictions to things like studying, exercising and careers can become serious physical, emotional and even financial problems.

Tuesday, Michael Leahy spoke about his 30-year addiction to pornography and the effects of porn on college students at Porn Nation.

According to PornNation.org, due to his addiction, Leahy's marriage and countless other relationships – including those with his sons and his business partner – were ruined.

While this might seem like an extreme response, addiction never is a positive state.

Addictions are damaging to not only the person with the addiction but also the people in his or her life.

Some addictions are damaging to the subject of the addiction as well.

Porn addictions create alternative – and often incorrect – views of people and sex.

Addiction to pornography also has harmful effects on relationships. People with an addiction turn to a magazine or a video rather than interacting with a significant other.

It is commendable that people like Leahy step up and present their experiences when they believe they are doing so for a bigger cause. Porn Nation calls for action that will promote successful relationships.

It is vital that people should take responsibility now – especially during these college years of growth and maturity – to prevent the effects of any addiction.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Action after online identity theft can prevent loss

Less than two years ago, a man pretended to be me. A year later, it happened again.

My reaction was, "Why would anyone want to live the life of a crazed 20-something K-State student?" And then, "Can I make them take my midterm?" But this was no joke.

I was a victim of Internet fraud and identity theft.

I turned 20 right before my first scam, and decided to splurge on my first digital camera. I spent $500 on Yahoo! Auctions. Consumers rated my seller as a trustworthy businessman, but the product never came through. Even worse, the person tried to withdraw money from my bank account.

I spent countless hours contacting law enforcement and Yahoo! about ways to get my money back. Because I waited two weeks, they told me it was a lost cause, and the bad guy got away.

This past year, a second person tried to bank on my bucks. This person obtained my username and password to eBay, and I noticed charges appearing on my account.

Based on my prior experience, I understood the procedures I needed to perform to protect my information. I contacted law enforcement, credit fraud agencies and businesses immediately. My speedy approach saved me thousands, and we caught the bad guy.

Just like the average college student, I plan to leave K-State in five years, raking in a painful $30,000 debt. I'll face many challenges within the ever-so-lucrative field of journalism. And I'll have to find some reasonable way to convert my purple-clad wardrobe into some presentable excuse for clothing for my non-K-State friends.

The last thing I need is to have people trying to be me. Isn't one Annette enough?

We've all seen the scams out there: Internet donation charity Web sites; e-mails from Elbowistan seeking a person generous enough to spill credit information; or the ever-so-famous "earn thousands" through our work-at-home venture.

The Internet has turned into a digital monster of mistrust, sucking away our money, but through these unbearable experiences, I have learned one thing: I am not alone.

According to a recent U.S. government study, 685,000 reported being victims of Internet fraud in 2005, with a total loss of $40 billion. Among the reports, 24 percent of victims are people ages 20 to 29, making them the second largest targeted group.

I quickly learned that to every bargain there is a cost, and this lesson was not cheap. I protected my information as best as I could, and the bad guys milked me of my cash – twice – and your information is vulnerable, too.

Safeguard your identity from the bad guys – or even those who seem good. If you are stripped of your wealth, act quickly.

Don't be afraid to talk law enforcement about it. If you don't take that proactive step, then the criminals win. It costs you nothing to be a skeptic but it can cost you everything to be carefree.

Racially tolerant lack diverse interactions

By Sahra Sulaiman
DAILY TROJAN

LOS ANGELES – As I settled into my seat in an airport shuttle early one Los Angeles morning, I looked up to see the white driver peering intently at me in the rearview mirror with an odd expression of apprehension and disbelief on his face.

"Is that your real last name?" he asked.

"Why, yes, it is indeed mine."

"You know, 'Sooo-laaay-mon' – that's an Islamic name," he pressed.

"I am indeed aware of that," I said, beginning to squirm under his suspicious gaze.

Apparently trying to reconcile a mental image of a Muslim who probably resembled that one turban-wearing, bearded, Quran-waving, machine-gun-brandishing, "death-to-America"-shouting, Islamo-fascist-jihadi-whatever guy we are used to seeing on the TV news, he gestured toward his chin, as if stroking a long beard, and stammered, "But ... you don't look like one of them A-rabs."

"No, I suppose not," I agreed. "I decided to shave the beard recently."

Surprising as it may sound to a white American, this sort of exchange is not so uncommon as one might think for those of us with darker skin or more ethnic features or names, even in today's multicultural and politically correct world. Growing up in a largely white area of Wisconsin, I was constantly asked about my background.

Well-meaning, curious Caucasians would push me for details and then let me know they were accepting of minorities by mentioning the one thing on which they felt they could relate to me: "So your mother is an Irish/German Catholic from New York and your father is a Muslim from India?"

"Oh, yes, of course – that explains your coloring. And your eyes, of course! India, my, how exotic! You know, I loved that Gandhi – now there was a good man."

"And may I compliment you: you speak wonderful English!"

"You are so kind," I would sigh resignedly. "I have been practicing."

Despite the latent ignorance in the queries I have endured, I honestly believe only a fraction of the people I have had such exchanges with would likely self-identify as racist or intolerant. Most were well intentioned with their questions and appeared to be proud for having demonstrated how tolerant they could be of a minority.

But well-meaning as such remarks may be, they have a much more onerous significance: they demonstrate how little personal interaction or exposure a person has had to another ethnic or racial group. The lack of understanding of another group forces speakers to revert to what they know, which, unfortunately, is often a negative image or stereotype of that group, in order to make sense of the person in front of them. The shuttle driver puzzled by my name clearly had not seen too many real, live Muslims close-up, and thus was trying to figure out how I could possibly be of the same background as the bearded jihadi he had in mind.

During the immigration debates last year, an NPR correspondent passionately reporting on the heated debates in the media and in the legislature declared this was an issue that touched her and others personally because, she noted earnestly, she had an immigrant nanny. For the listener, this reinforces the idea that these immigrants are not part of our social fabric but are outsiders linked only to our economic fabric.

There are countless impressive and inspiring black and other minority leaders in our communities. That they have not appeared on some radars before now should give us reason to pause and ask how deeply we actually practice the multiculturalism and tolerance we preach in our daily lives.

MAN ACCUSED IN DEATHS OF VANCOUVER WOMEN: 'I WANTED TO KILL 75'

NEW WESTMINSTER, British Columbia — A pig farmer accused in the deaths of women from a gritty Vancouver neighborhood told an undercover police officer he wanted to kill 75 but planned to take a break after one more slaying made it “an even 50,” according to a jail cell video shown at his trial Tuesday.

The officer — who cannot be identified under court order — told the jury that he posed as a man facing attempted murder charges and gained Robert Pickton’s trust during their incarceration. Pickton, 56, is charged with 26 counts of murder. He denied guilt.

Prosecutors said when the trial opened three weeks ago Pickton told the undercover officer he killed 49 women and was caught before he could reach his goal of 50.

The videotape played for jurors Tuesday showed Pickton sauntering back into the jail cell after an 11-hour interrogation with police, appearing upbeat and confident.

Looking over at the officer, he held up five fingers and a zero with his other hand.

“I was going to do one more; make it an even 50,” Pickton said.

‘I’M GOING TO BE SICK,’ PILOT SAYS AFTER ACCIDENTAL KILLING

LONDON — A leaked cockpit video published Tuesday captures a dramatic exchange between two American pilots whose voices choke up when they learn they have killed a British soldier in a 2003 friendly fire incident in Iraq.

“I’m going to be sick,” one pilot says, later adding, “We’re in jail, dude.”

Despite British requests, the Pentagon had refused to release the video to the family of Lance Cpl. Matty Hull, who died when U.S. jets fired on his convoy in the city of Basra.

After excerpts of the video were published in The Sun newspaper and the footage was widely broadcast, U.S. authorities agreed to release it.

Neither pilot from the Boise, Idaho-based 190th Fighter Squadron was disciplined in the U.S. military’s own investigation, which concluded the pilots “followed the procedures and processes for engaging targets,” Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Tuesday.

The leaking of the tape strained relations between the Department of Defense and their British counterparts, who were previously given a DVD of the classified video.

TODDLERS BEHIND BARS: SPANISH PRISON OFFERS FAMILY CELLS

ARANJUEZ, Spain — Victor Manuel Lozano spends his days like most 2-year-olds. He goes to nursery school, he draws. The difference is he does it in prison, living with mom, a convicted murderer, and dad, a drug trafficker.

Aranjuez Prison, Spanish officials say, is the only one in the world with cells for families. The spacious units come with cribs, Disney characters on the walls and access to a prison playground.

The idea is for children to bond with their jailed parents while young enough not to fully grasp the reality of prison, and to teach parenting skills to inmates seeking rehabilitation. The total number of children currently stands at 32.

“They take good care of us, and having my child and husband with me makes me very happy,” said Carmen Garcia, 28, Victor Manuel’s mother. “But this is not the best place to bring up a child. In some ways they are imprisoned too.”

Garcia was jailed in 1998 for 10 years for murdering her boyfriend. Victor Lozano entered the jail the following year for an 11-year term.

Humane society event raises awareness of abandoned pets

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Humane Society is trying to prevent too much of what normally is a good thing.

RCHS, along with animal organizations and shelters across America, has named February “Prevent-a-Litter Month” to promote the spaying and neutering of pets.

The society is providing $20 rebates on spay or neuter surgeries in conjunction with several area veterinarians.

The hope is that pet owners who held off on the operation due to financial need will find it affordable now, the organization said in a statement.

Pet owners wanting the rebate will need the coupon the RCHS printed in the Manhattan Mercury and Wamego Smoke Signal last month. They will reprint the coupon Feb. 14.

Neutering is the common term for sterilizing a male pet while spaying refers to sterilizing a female.

The main purpose of sterilizing pets is to prevent area cat and dog populations from growing too large.

Dr. Sue Nelson, clinical assistant professor at the College of Veterinary Medicine, said the problem is widespread and evident at animal shelters that are packed with unwanted animals.

She said spaying usually costs more than neutering because it’s a more complex and invasive process, but joked that the animals might not see it that way.

“It depends on if you asked a male or a female,” Nelson said.

Dr. John Lyons of Candlewood Veterinary Clinic said he believed all the veterinary clinics in the area, his included, are participating in the campaign and encouraged pet owners to be aware of their animals’ fertility.

“There’s just so many unadoptable pets out there that you’re really being irresponsible to contribute to that,” Lyons said.

Sterilized dogs roam less, making them less likely to be hit by cars and are also less likely to catch certain diseases.

“You can save yourself a whole lot of money in your pets’ lifetime if you have them spayed or neutered,” Lyons said.

Overpopulation is a problem in the area, said Lynn Schumacher, director of the T. Russell Reitz Animal Shelter. She said 983 dogs and cats were surrendered to the shelter in 2006 by owners who didn’t want them anymore, and 1,506 were brought in as animals at large.

“I can tell you there’s definitely too many animals coming into the shelter,” Schumacher said.

She said she is glad the RCHS promotes the spaying and neutering of animals because education is needed here, but the shelter doesn’t have the funds for this sort of promotion.

Schumacher said the shelter had to euthanize more than 900 animals in 2006 because of behavior, temperament, illness or aggression but stressed the shelter is not meant to be a final destination for animals.

She said her research has found there is no demographic group that contributes to the problem more than others, but the number one reason they cite the shelter is behavioral problems.

Schumacher said a majority of the animals were originally gifts from friends or relatives.

Owners should do two things upon getting a pet, Schumacher said.

First, she said they should have the pet spayed or neutered, and second, they should take responsibility for that animal for its entire life.

“There are seven animals born for every person,” Schumacher said “How long is it before a baby can own one animal?”

Add cardio to workout for improved stamina

Crank up the cardio and whip that heart into shape.

February is American Heart Month, and what better way to take part in the celebration than to give that heart and the rest of your body a good workout?

MELISSA HAUG

The American Council on Exercise describes cardiorespiratory fitness as the health and function of the heart, lungs and circulatory system.

It is related to the body's ability to persist or sustain activity for prolonged periods of time. Translation: heart-pumping endurance.

Getting into "good cardio shape" will result in more stamina, which in turn leads to less fatigue and fewer risks of injuries.

Basically, if you are exercising your heart, you will be able to participate in other activities, such as team sports, weight training or even walking on campus for a longer time before feeling worn out.

The ability to continue activity longer is only one of the numerous benefits that accompanies improved cardiorespiratory fitness.

Getting your heart and lungs in top condition will reduce your risk for diseases like obesity, hypertension (high blood pressure) and diabetes.

For gradual improvements of cardiorespiratory fitness and decreased body fat percentage, it is important to get your heart rate up at least three days per week, with no more than two days rest between workouts.

To keep your cardiorespiratory workouts challenging, work to maintain variety in the exercises you do.

It is beneficial to gradually increase exercise duration as well as enhance intensity of the exercise by increasing resistance or incline.

If you happen to be a beginner with lower cardiorespiratory endurance, get started with 10 to 20 minutes of aerobic conditioning.

Any activity that continuously uses large muscle groups for at least 20 minutes or more can target your cardiovascular and respiratory systems.

If you are conditioning, you should be exercising the heart anywhere from 20 to 45 minutes.

People with elevated cardiorespiratory fitness levels can follow guidelines for 30 to 60 minutes of exercise.

Although it is important to get the recommended amount of exercise, keep in mind that to obtain health benefits it is necessary to reach and maintain your target heart rate.

Activities like running, walking, bicycling, swimming, rowing, stair or rock climbing and jumping rope will place an added demand on your cardiovascular and respiratory systems and keep your heart rate elevated to achieve and improve your cardiorespiratory endurance.

A healthy body will lead to a healthy mind. But to achieve that, you must first achieve heart fitness.

Your health | National Heart Month

Pump it up

Illustration by Donnie Lee | COLLEGIAN

Prevent disease with more activity, better nutrition

When I ask you to think of February, what's the first thing that comes to mind?

I'm sure an overwhelming number of K-Stater students immediately think of Black History Month, Valentine's Day and the always exciting Abraham Lincoln's birthday. Don't forget about the original G.W., either. We celebrate George Washington's Birthday on Feb. 22.

Yet, February also observes another important cause — one that is too often overlooked.

The cause is American Heart Month.

Though you may not know it, you've probably already seen some of the celebrations.

During the Super Bowl, the American Heart Association ran a commercial depicting a heart being kidnapped and then severely beaten by several ferocious assailants, including high blood pressure, obesity and that nasty witch, diabetes.

I'm sure the consensus would be that this commercial definitely was not the best among those shown during the game. A couple of my friends even gave it the "stupid" rating.

However, I happened to like the skit, and you didn't even need to know that this month is American Heart Month to appreciate it.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, heart disease and stroke are the first and third leading causes of death for both American men and women. The AHA also adds that one in five women will die of heart disease, almost twice the number of those who succumb to cancer.

What's worse, the CDC reports about one million Americans die every year from cardiovascular disease. That equates to one death every 35 seconds.

More than 70 million Americans suffer the effects of cardiovascular disease, and the CDC estimated heart disease and stroke cost the United States $403 billion in 2006 due to health care costs and lost productivity from disability and death.

However, the most shocking statistic of all is the fact that heart disease is largely preventable.

TRENT SCOTT

So how do we stop this epidemic? You hear experts use the term "silent killer" all the time, and when the topic is heart disease, the title couldn't be more fitting. But how do we fight something we can't see or feel until it's usually too late?

It's called prevention. We have to start making changes today to prevent the statistics from becoming even more outrageous in the future.

So what do we do? Here's what the AHA recommends:

■ First, be more active.

Living a physically inactive lifestyle can be severely detrimental to your health and well being. Sedentary people are more likely to suffer from high blood pressure and cholesterol, both of which are leading causes of heart disease. They also make themselves more prone to obesity, which in turn can lead to diabetes and a host of other problems that all ultimately increase their risk for heart disease and stroke.

■ Second, choose good nutrition.

Eating foods that are high in saturated fats and sodium quickly can lead to complications with high blood pressure and cholesterol. Also, centering your diet on foods that are not nutrient-dense can cause you to consume an enormous amount of calories without actually getting the recommended daily requirements for each food group. This can lead to obesity and diabetes. Regularly consuming large amounts of alcohol also can increase your risk for heart disease.

■ Finally, avoid tobacco.

This one goes without saying. You know that you shouldn't smoke. You know that it's absolutely terrible for you. So put down your cigarette, and do your family, friends and heart a favor.

Running can be a good source of exercise for the heart. An elevated heart rate can improve cardiorespiratory endurance.

Heart-rate reserve formula

According to the American College of Sports Medicine (ACSM), the average exercise intensity for healthy adults is between 64 and 94 percent of their maximum heart-rate reserve. To discover your heart-rate reserve, subtract your age from 220. Once you have determined your predicted heart-rate reserve, you can multiply by the percentage of exercise intensity you would like to achieve. The resulting answer will be the heart rate you want to obtain and monitor when exercising.

For example, $220 - 32$ (years old) = 188. Then, $188 \times .70$ (or 70 percent of max heart rate) = 131 beats per minute for the exercise heart rate.

Cardio intensity

ACSM (American College of Sports Medicine) recommends cardiorespiratory fitness to last 20 to 60 minutes with continuous or intermittent aerobic activity and be at an intensity between 55 percent and 85 percent of maximum heart rate.

FBN | Snickers ad pulled after complaints from gay groups

HACKETTSTOWN, N.J. — A commercial for Snickers candy bars launched in the Super Bowl broadcast was benched after its maker got complaints that it was homophobic.

The ad showed two auto mechanics accidentally kissing while eating the same candy bar and then ripping out some chest hair to do something "manly."

One of the alternate endings on the Snickers Web site showed the men attacking each other.

The Human Rights Campaign and the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation complained to the maker of Snickers, Hackettstown-based Masterfoods USA, a division of Mars Inc., which also makes M&M's and other candies.

The Web site also featured video of players from the Super Bowl teams reacting to the kiss.

"This type of jeering from professional sports figures at the sight of two men kissing fuels the kind of anti-gay bullying that haunts countless gay and lesbian school children on playgrounds all across the country," Human Rights Campaign president Joe Solmonese said in a statement.

GLAAD spokesman Marc McCarthy said Tuesday the group believed "this kind of prejudice was inexcusable."

Masterfoods spokeswoman Alice Nathanson issued a statement in which she said the company would stop running the ad on television and the Web site.

WRE | 6 more high schools report herpes cases

ST. PAUL, Minn. — Six more schools reported cases of herpes among Minnesota high school wrestlers.

The mild form of herpes was found in 16 additional wrestlers after the Minnesota State High School League shut down the sport last week because of the virus. So far, 16 teams and 40 wrestlers have reported infections of the skin-to-skin virus. Symptoms included lesions on the face, head and neck of wrestlers.

The high school league imposed an eight-day ban on practice and competition after herpes gladiatorum was diagnosed in several wrestlers. Teams were scheduled to resume practices and matches Wednesday.

The source of the outbreak hasn't been determined. It was thought that it might have originated with wrestlers from Valentine High School in Nebraska who had competed in a meet in Rochester. Examinations of the Nebraska wrestlers showed no evidence of herpes.

BBO | Kansas City signs Wellemeyer to 1-year deal

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Royals signed right-handed pitcher Todd Wellemeyer to a one-year contract Tuesday and avoided salary arbitration.

Wellemeyer's one-year, $635,000 contract means that all arbitration-eligible Royals players have been signed.

Wellemeyer, 28, joined the Royals in the middle of last season after the Florida Marlins placed him on waivers. He went 1-2 with a team-leading 3.63 ERA in 28 relief appearances for Kansas City, allowing just 48 hits in 57.0 innings.

His 57 innings from June 9 to the end of the season led all Royals relievers.

Kansas City also signed right-handed pitcher Jason Standridge on Tuesday to a minor league contract with an invitation to spring training camp.

Standridge has played for Tampa Bay, Texas and Cincinnati in his career and split his 2006 season between the Reds and Triple-A Louisville.

BBO | 1957 World Series MVP dead at 80

WINTER GARDEN, Fla. (AP) — Lew Burdette, MVP of the 1957 World Series when he pitched the Milwaukee Braves to their only championship, died Tuesday. He was 80.

Burdette had been ill for an extended period with lung cancer. Family members were with him when he died at home, they told the Atlanta Braves.

A two-time All-Star and a member of the Braves' Hall of Fame, Burdette was 203-144 with a 3.66 ERA from 1950-67. He also pitched a no-hitter.

Burdette's greatest success came in the 1957 Series when he went 3-0 with an 0.67 ERA while pitching three complete games against the New York Yankees. He capped his performance with a seven-hit shutout in Game 7 at Yankee Stadium, finishing off a run of 24 straight scoreless innings.

2008 PRESIDENTIAL RACE

No clear favorite as early presidential hopefuls vie for attention

By Brett King
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the first time since 1928, no current president or vice president will run in the 2008 election.

According to the Democratic Party Web site, the primary in Iowa is scheduled for Jan. 14, 2008, and will be the first of the 2008 election cycle.

The date of the Iowa primary violates New Hampshire state law, which dictates that its primary must take place seven days prior to any other primary in the country.

Despite the jump start to election hype, Joe Aistrup, head of the Department of Political Science, said candidates have announced their candidacy early for years.

"This has been a long-term trend since Jimmy Carter announced his candidacy early in his campaign close to a year and a half before the Iowa primary," he said.

According to The Associated Press, Democratic National Committee officials have threatened to keep any presidential candidates from attending the New Hampshire primary if the primary is moved from the scheduled date of Jan. 22, 2008.

"We have a very broad list of candidates," said Ben Davis, president of the K-State College Republicans and senior in political science. "Everything from pretty moderate with Rudy Giuliani to ultra-conservative Sam Brownback and Tancred." Many of the candidates for both the Democratic and Republican parties have declared they were setting up presidential exploratory committees.

Ron Elving said in his article "Declaring for President is a Dance of Seven Veils," posted on the National Public Radio Web site, a presidential exploratory committee "creates a legal shell for a candidate who expects to spend more than $5,000 while contemplating an actual run."

"Under the rules, exploratory money may be raised without the full disclosure of sources required of true candidates."

Only when the candidate drops the exploratory label does the full responsibility of transparency apply."

According to a recent Time Magazine poll conducted on Jan. 22 and 23, early Republican leaders include former mayor Rudy Giuliani of New York City, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney.

The Democratic Party frontrunners include Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, according to the same Time Magazine poll.

"There are a lot of different issues and a lot of different opinions within the Democratic Party," said Aaron Apel, president of the Kansas State Young Democrats and junior in philosophy. "That kind of diversity on the issues is definitely a good thing."

Krista Leben, of the Kansas

State Young Democrats, said Clinton is a strong candidate.

"Her polling numbers are high, but people in the party are worried about her electability," said Leben, junior in political science.

Adrienne Carraway, senior in mass communication and member of College Republicans, said some might feel inclined to vote for Clinton for different reasons.

"There are too many dumb women who will vote for her just because she is a woman, not because she is creditable or has the credibility to become the president," Carraway said.

Both political student organizations are planning programs for their candidates.

Apel said the Young Democrats are in the process of working with the University of Kansas Young Democrats to start a bid for a bipartisan voter education course in every high school in the state of Kansas.

"We don't want to be just the Young Democrats and College Republicans," Apel said. "We would like to include other organizations like HALO and BSU. We want to get as many people who are concerned about spreading political education."

Davis said he thought it likely for voters of both parties to experience increased pressure when considering the best recipient of the vote.

"Republicans will try to gain seats back, while the Democrats are going to try and hold what they have and possibly gain more," he said.

3 K-State students strive to reach big dreams, goals

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The entertainment business is known to be tough, and some entertainers might do anything to make it big.

These K-State students share their plans about following their dreams to stardom.

TAKING A CHANCE

Nick Robinson, senior in theater, said he plans to graduate in May and wants to get out of Manhattan quickly and to work toward his lifelong dream.

Robinson said he already has bought his plane ticket to New York City where he plans to look for theater companies and take more professional classes.

"My first goal is to audition for a touring company and work my way up so that I can someday be on Broadway," he said. "It's all about networking and being at the right place at the right time."

Robinson grew up in a family of music directors - several that directed high school musicals - and has continued the tradition with his performances in several K-State musicals like "Pippin," as well as the Manhattan Arts Center's "You're a Good Man, Charlie Brown."

He said he has several "friends living in New York who could live with, and he plans to move into an apartment with friends from K-State who plan to work there also."

Robinson plans to work for a temporary-work agency, waiting tables somewhere while he works toward Broadway.

"I'm legitimately nervous, and I'm going to get there and fall flat on my face," he said. "But if you've always had a dream, why not go for it?"

PLAYING IT BY EAR

Donald Holliday, senior in sociology, said he always has loved to sing and write music.

But his mere interest has turned into something more with the upcoming release of two albums.

"I've always been interested in music since I was a little kid," Holliday said. "It was never a priority, and it didn't turn into what it is now until the last few years, but the passion has always been there."

Holliday said he is working with another singer, Mardell Maxwell, junior in business, and the two will be releasing one of their albums on Valentine's Day.

The pair met while in K-State Singers before Maxwell released his second solo album, Holliday said.

"It just kind of snowballed," he said. "At first it was just an idea."

They started performing at different K-State activities and for promotional events for Maxwell's albums, Holliday said.

He said he and Maxwell both write their songs, and sometimes sing other artists' songs while performing.

Holliday said his priority now is making music and singing, but he plans to "play it by ear" in the future.

"There are so many doors that have been opened for me," he said.

He said his future plans might include getting a master's degree in sociology.

He also wrestles for K-State and said he has had job offers for an assistant coach's position.

"Music is always another option," he said. "We have a lot of connections, but I'm prioritizing, and school comes first. I don't want to put all my eggs in one basket."

A DIFFERENT LIGHT

Elise Podhajsky, sophomore in pre-journalism and mass communications, said she couldn't believe her luck when she talked her parents into letting her sign with a modeling and talent agency when she was 16.

Nick Robinson, senior in theater, poses with his collection of playbills. Robinson hopes to perform on Broadway after graduation.

Podhajsky said she always had wanted to be in fashion magazines like Seventeen, but said her parents were skeptical.

Her parents allowed her to sign with an agency after hearing about one of her friends who had success with the agency.

"I went to my first photo shoot, and it was so fun, but I wasn't actually happy about my pictures," she said.

Podhajsky was told later that she couldn't do runway modeling because she wasn't tall enough.

Eventually, she began working at promotional events and almost did a photo shoot for Lee Jeans, but the company decided she was too young.

While she enjoyed being at the casting calls, she said she still was not getting the kind of jobs she wanted.

Last summer, Podhajsky said she went to the Actors, Models and Talent Competition and was successful in the acting portion of the competition. Although she liked acting, she didn't want to pursue it.

"I don't think it's a realistic goal, and I don't want to take classes for acting when I could be doing other things for my major," she said.

However, Podhajsky still signed with the agency and said if she was offered to do another photo shoot, she would do it.

"I really like being in front of the camera, and I want to be in a print sometime," she said. "At the same time, I don't really care enough to keep my body in shape as it should be for that kind of stuff."

Podhajsky said she loves fashion and realized her passion for it through modeling.

She said she still would like to be in the industry somehow and would like to get an internship with a major publishing company and someday have her own column for a fashion magazine.

Lawyers postpone waste, fraud inquiry

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON - Government lawyers have hampered investigations into waste and fraud at the Homeland Security Department, officials told Congress on Tuesday.

The head of the Government Accountability Office, the nonpartisan investigative arm of the Congress, and the department's own inspector general said Homeland Security officials, particularly lawyers in the general counsel's office, had delayed probes and demanded inappropriate access to interviews with employees. There was no suggestion of criminality.

Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke denied the allegations, terming them inaccurate and unfair. He said there are many times that investigators from both offices have interviewed employees without attorneys present and that the general counsel's office is involved only when sensitive information is discussed.

Both investigators told a House subcommittee that numerous inquiries into waste, abuse or management problems had been delayed.

"They're not very responsive. They don't give information quickly," said David Walker, head of the GAO.

"Every document we seek to review has to be reviewed (first) by the general counsel's office," Walker added. He said the department's general counsel wants to "sit in on every interview," which he deemed inappropriate.

Walker said when there are more lawyers than other staff involved, "you've got problems."

"I agree wholeheartedly," said Inspector General Richard Skinner. Skinner also said that having a supervisor or attorney present when his office interviews an employee "sets a chilling effect" and tells the employee he's presumed not to be a team player.

Until his resignation last month, the general counsel was Phil Perry, son-in-law of Vice President Dick Cheney.

Walker and Skinner told the House subcommittee that "the tone is set from the top" and that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff himself needs to address the situation.

"You can be assured that we're hearing you loud and clear," replied the panel's chairman, Rep. David Price, D-N.C. Chertoff is due on Thursday to make his first appearance before the subcommittee since Democrats took control of Congress.

Skinner also complained that he had asked department leaders to send a message to all employees explaining what his office does, and how to contact it. He said the draft letter had been "sitting in the general counsel's office" since last summer.

Knocke said the inspector general has an informative and detailed page on the department's intranet Web page that is available to all employees. Knocke said that is the usual mechanism for communicating with nearly 200,000 employees scattered around the world.

However, Knocke acknowledged that a recent "all hands" message was sent as a letter to all employees by Deputy Secretary Michael Jackson. The Associated Press reported last week that a survey found Homeland Security employees ranking last in job satisfaction of 36 federal agencies. Jackson wrote it was a "clear and jolting message" that department leadership was taking seriously.

That survey also came up at Tuesday's hearing, with Rep. Jose Serrano, D-N.Y., questioning the two watchdogs on whether such bad morale could have an impact on national security.

Skinner said some morale problems stem from combining 22 disparate agencies when the department was created in 2003.

For example, the new agencies born from the old Customs and Immigration agencies have suffered from "very, very severe competition, jealousies, cultural differences, inability to get along with one another, inability or refusal to share information."

Lauren Phillips, junior in biology, left, and Kate Boysen, junior in Spanish and sociology, wait for the movie "An Inconvenient Truth" to show in the K-State Student Union Little Theater.

Film backed by former vice president urges viewers to change world

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Al Gore ended "An Inconvenient Truth" calling for viewers to run for political office and end global warming.

He said in the film that plenty of proof exists to support global warming but politicians are not ready to effectively address the problem. Gore said people can reverse the effects of global warming by releasing less carbon dioxide and growing more plants or trees.

Students for Environmental Action and Gamma Theta Upsilon, a national geography honor society, hosted a showing of Gore's film at the Little Theater in the K-State Student Union on Tuesday night.

Becky Clark, president of SEA, saw the movie for the second time. She said they decided to show the film because Larry Schweiger, director of the National Wildlife Federation, will speak Thursday night at Forum Hall.

"We said, 'Why don't we just make this a global warming week and show 'An Inconvenient Truth' the same week,'" Clark said.

"An Inconvenient Truth" used data and predictions from respected scientists to show the climate changes occurring in the world. Gore said global warming could cause ice sheets in Greenland and Antarctica to melt and raise global sea levels by 20 feet, which would result in floods and produce 100 million refugees worldwide.

Greenhouse gases cause global warming when they are trapped in the earth's atmosphere by carbon dioxide and other gases. The result is a continuous rise in temperatures around the world.

"If you drive to school and you can walk or ride your bike, then you need to stop," said Clark, a fifth-year student in biology. "Not only are you contributing to the parking problem on campus, but you're also hurting our local air quality."

Despite being a documentary on global warming, the film also was filled with segments about Gore's childhood and his political career. In one scene, Gore introduced himself as the man who "used to be the next president of the United States."

"I think going into his presidential background was a good thing," said Rylan Ortiz, senior in electrical engineering. "I think it gets a lot of people who have those stereotypes to believe not only him but also scientists."

The film premiered at the 2006

Sundance Film Festival, and it is the third-highest-grossing documentary in the United States. Gore and Paramount Classics, the film's distributor, pledged proceeds from the movie to educational campaigns about climate change.

"This was one of the first major productions that has addressed global climate change that has reached the everyday person," said Tom Vought, social director of Gamma Theta Upsilon and graduate student in geography. "It was designed for this exact kind of thing, and it's a problem that affects us all."

The Union Program Council showed "An Inconvenient Truth" Jan. 30. Clark said the Manhattan Public Library will have two more showings of the film in February, and the Union also will play it once more this month.

Reviewer covers gypsy, show tune, hip-hop sounds

Beirut, "Gulag Orkestar"

★★★★☆

Album review by Mark Sibilla

Sounding like the music of gypsy muses traveling across the Eastern European landscape, one would never guess this debut is actually the work of 19-year-old Albuquerque, N.M., native Zach Condon.

Using a wide variety of instruments including ukuleles, mandolins, accordions and cellos (and amazingly, no guitars), Condon has created an immersive album heavily influenced by Balkan folk music. While the musical arrangements are breathtaking, what truly is marvelous is the histrionic baritone of Condon, which brings to mind the work of Rufus Wainwright.

You owe it to yourself to check out this haunting, majestic album.

Nellie McKay, "Pretty Little Head"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

The eclectic sophomore album from this quirky diva was delayed for more than a year due to a caustic dispute with McKay's record label over the album's content.

However, for fans of her first album, "Get Away from Me," this album was well worth the wait.

McKay jumps genres throughout the album like a frog from lily pad to lily pad.

Her mix of vaudeville, show tunes, pop, cabaret and even hip-hop highlights her amazing musical range.

While not every moment on this double album is essential, it just wouldn't be a Nellie McKay album without her charming idiosyncrasies.

The Game, "Doctor's Advocate"

★★★★☆

Album review by Mark Sibilla

Hot on the heels of his brilliant debut, "The Documentary," Jayceon Taylor (aka The Game) has severed his ties with 50 Cent and his G-Unit crew through ugly public disputes.

Even Dr. Dre, The Game's idol and mentor, decided not to contribute to the album.

Yet without the beats of Dre and the support of G-Unit, The Game manages to create a compelling album of hardcore West Coast hip-hop.

The Game is guilty of hero worship, as evident on his debut.

But on "Doctor's Advocate," The Game manages to build his own persona, instilling a strong argument for crowning The Game king of West Coast hip-hop.

agreed the issue of pornography hits close to home for many K-State students.

"A few of my friends have struggled with pornography in their relationships," Lueck said. "I feel like it is a key issue for people our age."

Relationships were the central theme of Leahy's presentation - his relationship with pornography, his relationship with others and his relationship with God.

Leahy even spoke about his relationship with Jeremy, the prolific pornography actor and producer.

"I do consider him a friend," Leahy said. "I'm not sure I'm fond of what he's doing. He certainly treats me with respect, and I try to do the same for him."

In fact, Leahy said he experienced a revelation of sorts while sitting in a Jacuzzi with Jeremy in Baton Rouge, La., before a debate at Louisiana State.

"There was a lot in common with Ron and I," Leahy realized. "We both bought into some lies somewhere along the line."

Although Leahy said he and Jeremy are friends, he admits their debates are often one-sided, at least in the audience's opinion.

"It's a Ron Jeremy fan club anytime we do the debates," Leahy said.

Still, Leahy said the debates have facilitated insightful discussions.

"The students are typically very respectful," Leahy said. "They typically ask very good questions when they're not asking Ron about some kind of sexual act that he just committed."

UTD will enter the names of the participants who attended Tuesday's card-writing event into a drawing for gift certificates during the final UTD event on Mar. 30.

Students participated for different reasons. Rachel Belden, senior in finance, said she wanted to participate in UTD to bring a smile to a St. Jude child's face.

"I'm writing in my cards basically, 'Hope you're having a great Valentine's Day,'" Belden said.

"These cards are more personal, because I send fewer valentine cards."

Katie Gorham, freshman in business, said making Valentines Day cards will hopefully cheer up the kids.

"It's not just the people in the hospital who have the same thoughts hoping for them to get better," Gorham said. "So many of us care for them and are hoping they get better."

Astronaut charged with attempted murder in perceived love triangle

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ORLANDO, Fla. — She was the RoboChick. He was Billy-O.

According to police, her obsession with him led her to drive 900 miles from Houston to Orlando, bringing with her a trenchcoat and wig, armed with a BB gun and pepper spray, and wearing a diaper to avoid bathroom breaks on the arduous drive.

Once in Florida, Lisa "RoboChick" Nowak apparently confronted the woman she believed was her rival for the affections of William "Billy-O" Oefelein. And this tawdry love triangle has one more twist - it involves two astronauts.

Nowak, 43, a married mother of three who flew on a space shuttle in July, was charged with attempted murder, accused of hatching an extraordinary plot to kidnap Colleen Shipman, who she believed was romantically involved with Oefelein, a space shuttle pilot.

Specifically, police said Nowak confronted Shipman, who was in her car at the Orlando airport, and sprayed something at her, possibly pepper spray.

At first the astronaut was charged with attempted kidnapping and other counts, and a judge had permitted her release on bail. Then, in a surprise move, prosecutors upped the charge to attempted murder, basing it on the weapons and other items they said they had found with Nowak or in her car: a pepper spray package, an unused BB-gun cartridge, a new steel mallet, knife, rubber tubing and large garbage bags.

Nowak's lawyer, Donald Lykkebak, disputed that upgraded charge, which allowed police to keep the astronaut in jail. "In the imaginations of the police officers, they extend these facts out into areas where the facts can't be supported," said Lykkebak.

As the hearings on charges and bail played out on TV, the astonishing details about the case were repeatedly broadcast and quickly made the rounds of office e-mails and Internet blogs.

The details of the relationships of all three were unclear. Nowak and Oefelein, who both live in the Houston area, had trained together as astronauts, but never flew into space together. Shipman, 30, works at Patrick Air Force Base near Kennedy Space Center.

Earlier, Nowak was quoted by police as saying she and Oefelein had something "more than a working relationship but less than a romantic relationship."

Neither Oefelein nor Shipman could be reached for comment Tuesday, nor could Nowak's husband be found.

But police found a letter in Nowak's car that "indicated how much Mrs. Nowak loved Mr. Oefelein," the arrest affidavit said. And Nowak had copies of e-mails between Shipman and Oefelein.

Police said Nowak, believing Shipman was romantically involved with Oefelein, had driven 900 miles from Houston - wearing diapers in the car so she would not have to make bathroom stops - to confront Shipman as she arrived in Orlando on a flight from Houston.

There, police said, Nowak donned a wig and trench coat, boarded an airport shuttle bus with Shipman and followed her to her car. Then, crying, Nowak sprayed a chemical into the car.

Shipman drove to a parking lot booth and sought help.

Inside Nowak's car, which was parked at a nearby motel, authorities found copies of e-mails between Shipman and Oefelein, along with the BB-gun cartridge and other items.

A police affidavit, made public Tuesday, noted Nowak had "urinated in a diaper so that she did not need to stop," and "stealthily followed the victim while in disguise and possessed multiple deadly weapons."

The affidavit said the circumstances of the case "create a well-founded fear" and gave investigators "probable cause to believe that Mrs. Nowak intended to murder Ms. Shipman."

The judge initially had set bail at $15,500 and ordered Nowak to stay away from Shipman and wear an electronic monitoring device upon returning to her home in Houston.

"I guess they didn't like the ruling in the court this morning, did they?" Lykkebak said.

He said that Nowak only wanted to talk to Shipman. Asked about the weapons, he said, "You can sit and speculate all day."

Saying he was surprised by the case, NASA spokesman John Ira Petty at Johnson Space Center in Houston said he was concerned about the people involved and their families. But, he added, "We try not to concern ourselves with our employees' personal lives."

A vague profile began to emerge of Nowak, who was graduated from high school in Maryland in 1981 and the U.S. Naval Academy in 1985. She has won various Navy service awards.

In a September interview with Ladies' Home Journal, Nowak said her husband, Richard, "works in Mission Control, so he's part of the whole space business, too. And supportive also."

Interpreters enjoy signing lectures for college students

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In some classes across campus, an extra person sits alongside the instructor to help students understand the lecture.

However, these people use their hands instead of speaking with their mouths to get the message across through the use of sign language.

GETTING OVER STAGE FRIGHT

Megan Draper, senior in social sciences, is one of K-State's interpreters, and she said sitting in the front row signing to students can be "pretty nerve-wracking the first couple of times."

Draper said she learned to sign in high school and in a training program at Johnson County Community College.

"I knew a few deaf people, but when I started learning the language it wasn't one of those things I could let go," she said.

Some of the classes that Draper interprets have nothing to do with her major, but she said it gives her the chance to learn things that she never would have had the opportunity to know had she not been an interpreter.

PLAYING MATCHMAKER

Natalie Beharry, interpreter coordinator, said the Office of Disability Support Services has four full-time interpreters on campus who help seven students this semester.

She said she matches the interpreters with the students according to their schedules and the knowledge and background of the interpreter.

She said since the interpreters have different degrees, she tries to pair a student with an interpreter with similar knowledge so the interpreter knows the terminology used in the class.

"I think all of us have a pretty strong background in most of the general courses," she said.

Sometimes there are situations where an interpreter doesn't have any background knowledge in the class, she said, and in those cases the interpreter learns along with the student throughout the course.

Beharry said once she interpreted for a student who took a French class, although Beharry only knew a little French from high school and college.

She said she could only interpret the words she knew and the English portions of the lectures, and then the student read the instructor's lips for the rest.

Beharry said she also matches the type of sign language the student knows with the interpreter because the language has slight variations.

LEARNING BY SIGNING

Toni Kroll is one of the four campus interpreters and said she has been using sign language for 18 years.

She said she likes interpreting at a college campus because she feels like she always is learning.

"I'm doing animal science stuff right now, and I'm learning way more about horse reproduction than I ever needed to know," she said, laughing.

Kroll said she began learning the language because there was a large group of deaf people who went to her church when she was little, and then she became fluent when she studied it in school.

For years her social world was deaf people, including her friends, roommates and boyfriends, she said.

"I love the language, and I enjoy that it helps students," she said, "but I also love hanging out with deaf people and chatting."

She also has worked at elementary schools and taught non-credit classes at the UFM. She also did freelance work for the community when she lived in Washington D.C.

STARTING YOUNG

Maleah Ullmer, another interpreter, said she began learning the language when she was 8 years old because her mother started to lose her hearing.

She said they bought books to learn the language together. She said she is mostly a self-taught interpreter except for classes she took through college and churches.

Ullmer said she also has interpreted for an early-childhood program and at elementary and middle schools, although she likes working at college campuses more.

"It's more about the language," she said. "It's not about making sure the kid isn't hurt. It's more about focusing on the language, and it's just more difficult and more challenging."

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Maleah Ullmer, sign language interpreter for Disability Support Services, translates Kevin Blake's lecture. Blake is a professor in geography and teaches Geography of the American West on Tuesdays in Seaton Hall.

Shoot for the stars

High arc key to good shooting for junior Wildcat guard Dietz

By Dayne Logan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Certain players throughout basketball history seemed to have the power to make time stand still when they shot the ball. Michael Jordan, Larry Bird and Magic Johnson are a few who fall into this category, but there is another player closer to home that has a similar effect when she shoots. Kimberly Dietz's shot might not be as clutch as Jordan's, as pure as Bird's or as fluid as Johnson's, but it, too, has something special: height.

"It stops the hearts of all the fans and coaches and players in the gym," K-State women's basketball coach Deb Patterson said of Dietz's shot. "Sometimes I think the defense falls asleep because they're watching the ball."

Whether her shot is truly hypnotic or not is debatable, but Dietz's shot is definitely effective.

The junior guard leads the Wildcats in 3-pointers made with 51, and is second in points per game with 13.3 while shooting 73 percent from the free-throw line.

"The ball goes in when you have more height," Dietz said.

Christopher Bopp, a biomechanics instructor in the kinesiology department at K-State, agreed with Dietz. Bopp regularly uses sports physics as examples in his classes.

"If you drop the ball from directly above, it has a much greater chance of actually falling into the basket," Bopp said. "Whereas, as the approach angle becomes shallower and shallower the accuracy has to increase."

There are other benefits to a high-arching shot.

"You get time to see where it's going to go," Dietz said. "If it's off you get more time to rebound it."

A high shot also tends to make the ball land softer on the rim and therefore gives it a better chance of going in, Bopp said.

Unfortunately, there are also some drawbacks to having a shot like Dietz's.

"There's a trade-off because of the fatigue factor," Bopp said. "If you (shoot) the ball nice and high, you have to put a lot more effort into the ball."

As players get tired late in the game, the effort needed to continue to shoot the ball at a high trajectory is greater.

"A lot of players compensate by adjusting the angle as they get fatigued," Bopp said.

This sort of an adjustment can lead to poorer shooting not only because of the lower trajectory, but also because it forces the player to shoot in a different way than he or she is used to.

Dietz said she agreed with this assessment.

Players tend to use their legs less when they are tired, she said. When shooters don't use their legs they often leave shots short.

Patterson, however, said she didn't think the fatigue factor applied to Dietz.

"I've seen her make some pretty big shots late in the game," the coach said. "(In difficult situations) I want the ball in the hands of my best shooters. I don't care how high their arc is, I believe it's going in."

"Kimberly Dietz has a lot of arch on her ball. Sometimes we say if she shoots any higher, the ball is going to go through the roof."

— Shalee Lehning

Student group assembles to improve Bramlage atmosphere

By Parker Rome
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

What Huggins wants, Huggins gets. K-State basketball coach Bob Huggins called out fans for poor attendance at Bramlage Coliseum during a post-game interview after defeating Baylor 69-60 Jan. 17, and it didn't take long for a response.

"What concerned us was that the tickets were sold, but students weren't showing up," said Joni Weinman, assistant director of marketing and promotions for K-State Athletics.

The Department of Intercollegiate

Athletics sends a weekly e-mail to students reminding them of what is going on in K-State sports during the next week. The e-mail sent after the Baylor game included an e-mail address for students to send ideas about ways to improve game atmosphere.

"After receiving quite a few e-mails from students, we noticed they had several ideas on how to bring back old traditions from Ahearn (Fieldhouse) as well as start new traditions," Weinman said. "Along with our disappointment in student attendance, we decided to bring them all together."

On Jan. 26, the night before K-

State's home game against Nebraska, 16 students met with the athletic department for a focus group session.

Discussion involved the "Bring on the Cats" chant, clapping until K-State scores, giveaways, old Ahearn traditions, teaching students about K-State basketball history, camping out before games and setting up a ticket exchange program for students who don't want to attend games.

"I think the best thing that came out of the focus group is how the students are now working together to unify the entire student section," Weinman said.

The students at the meeting, who all hold basketball and football season tickets, created a group that meets before home games and works to get students involved.

"The goal is to make Bramlage a tough place to play," said Nathan Garcia, sophomore in accounting. "When I was a kid, I used to be a ball boy, and it was just dead in there. There was no atmosphere. Hopefully by the end of this season, we'll have some traditions set in place."

Garcia said the group wants to incorporate old traditions that were popular at Ahearn as well as start new ones.

"Our parents went to games at Ahearn and we've all heard about how cool it was to go to a game there, so we might as well take some of those traditions and fuse them with some new things," Garcia said.

He also said the group suggested playing videos from old games that were played in Ahearn to educate younger fans and remind alumni of the Ahearn era.

"I'm sure (alumni) would love that stuff, and it's hard to get them off their feet," Garcia said.

Off the Court with Shalee Lehning

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sophomore point guard Shalee Lehning, a native of Sublette, Kan., is looking for someone to teach her how to play the guitar. However, she might not be able to afford those lessons because a lot of her money goes toward purchasing shoes. Lehning recently answered questions ranging from her favorite store to her description of the perfect guy.

Q. What is your best memory of going fishing?

A. (Sophomore) Marlies Gipson and I actually went this past summer, and I caught what had to be a 10-pound bass. It was huge. We got it out of the water and it broke the line. It was that big. Before we got a picture, it got away. No one believed us.

Q. Who are the people holding the Sublette signs at games?

A. The sign is passed around between people in Sublette. Whoever is going to come up that weekend will take the sign. It is really awesome looking up and seeing them.

Q. Did you accept my Facebook.com friend request?

A. I don't know. What's your name? I think I add everyone from K-State, so yeah, why not?

Q. If you could create the perfect date, what would it be like?

A. Just being with someone who I really care about and who I know cares about me. He would bring me flowers and give me a hug, and we'd have fun just talking about life.

Q. What is your description of the perfect guy?

A. A guy with personality (who) cares about other people. Also a guy who is honest and responsible.

Q. Based on first impressions, do you see me as that guy?

A. Maybe. I don't know. You seem like a nice guy.

Q. Do you wear eyeliner during games?

A. Yes, I do. I think most of us do. I know (senior) Claire Coggins does for sure, and I think (junior Kimberly) Dietz might.

Q. How is learning to play the guitar going?

A. Not very well. I don't have a lot of free time, and as of now I haven't found anyone willing to teach me.

Q. What is your favorite store to shop at?

A. Probably Foot Locker. I have a shoe fetish, so every time I go in there I seem to come out with a pair of shoes.

Michael Beasley — 6-foot-9, 235-pound power forward
Notre Dame Prep School, Fitchburg, Mass.

Notre Dame Prep went 2-0 last week, and Beasley led the way for the Crusaders. In a victory over Navy Prep on Jan. 31, Beasley had 20 points and 16 rebounds.

Beasley came up big again Friday, scoring 21 points and grabbing 14 rebounds in a 93-88 overtime win against Winchendon School.

The power forward is averaging 23.7 points and 14.1 rebounds for the Crusaders, who are 25-2 and have four games this week.

Brown

Fred Brown — 6-foot-3, 185-pound shooting guard
William T. Dwyer High School, West Palm Beach, Fla.

The district playoffs begin this week in Florida, and the Panthers have been anything but consistent. After taking down Palm Beach Gardens — the No. 1 team in the state — a week ago, Dwyer went 1-1, beating sub-500 Suncoast and losing 59-52 in overtime to Jupiter.

Brown, one of the area's leading scorers at 19 points per game, had a season-low eight in the loss. He also made a huge mental mistake late, calling a timeout when the Panthers had none remaining.

Dwyer, state champion two of the last three seasons, is 16-8 this season.

Steve Dorsey of the Palm Beach Post contributed.

Pullen

Proviso East High School, Maywood, Ill.

The Pirates picked up two wins over the weekend, and the outcomes were lopsided in each game. On Friday, they beat sub-500 Willowbrook 72-46.

The next day, Pullen led Proviso East to a 73-48 blowout victory against Barrington in the Batavia Night of Hoops, scoring 17 points. The Pirates are 20-3 this season, including a perfect 9-0 in the West Suburban Gold Conference and are ranked No. 9 in the Chicago Sun-Times' latest poll.

The Chicago Sun-Times contributed.

The Patterson School, Lenoir, N.C.

The Patterson School played five games in the last week. They are ranked No. 3 in the national prep school rankings, right behind Notre Dame Prep, according to Crusader coach Bill Barton.

Men putting the pieces together

The Wildcats and Jayhawks are much improved from their memorable game in Lawrence a year ago, when K-State defeated Kansas 59-55 for the first time in 31 tries.

Although that game ranks highly among my favorite wins, it's time to put that in the backseat and let this year's team take the wheel.

There are a few new additions to both teams, but they primarily have the same players as last year. So the question that comes to mind is, can K-State do it again?

Of course I am going to say yes, but even from a non-biased opinion I believe the team has a legitimate shot at knocking off the Hawks.

This by no means will be an easy task. As much as I hate to admit it, Kansas has a good squad, with five returning starters and good depth off the bench.

Other factors that play in KU's favor are its to Texas A&M Saturday night, and most importantly, losing to the Wildcats last year. Each provides extra motivation.

So what pieces do the Wildcats need to put together in order to get the win?

K-State's strength is its scrappy, pressure, switching man-to-man defense.

On the offensive side of the ball, senior Cartier Martin needs to continue shooting the ball well from the perimeter, and other players need to step up like senior Lance Harris did Saturday in Austin, Texas (19 points and five 3-pointers).

Kansas will run a zone defense at some point during the game, so consistent outside shooting by K-State will keep the Jayhawks honest.

This also will create opportunities for junior David Hoskins' mid-range game to flourish.

Hoskins creates a match-up problem for any team, as he can overpower smaller guards and beat bigger players off the dribble.

An X-factor over the past few games has been the play of junior Clint Stewart.

Stewart is a smart point guard who takes care of the ball and runs the team well, but recently he has become more aggressive and offensive-minded, which gives K-State a new element.

Stewart is more of a threat when he plays with confidence because that's when he starts knocking down shots. He led the team in scoring in last year's matchup with 15 points, and if he can find his rhythm tonight the Jayhawks will have to respect his presence, creating more opportunities for others.

The Wildcats have all the pieces to win this game, it's just a matter of putting them together to solve the puzzle.

My favorite part of winning in Allen Fieldhouse last year was the silence of the crowd and the stunned looks on the faces of Jayhawk fans (No "Rock Chalk!").

I also loved seeing our fans waiting outside the locker room and cheering.

Let's hope they do it again this year - I'll see you in Huggieville after the game.

Hard work paying off for leaner, meaner Wildcats

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

David Hoskins flexes his muscles in a 61-45 win over Nebraska Jan. 27. Coach Bob Huggins has put the Wildcats through a rigorous workout program that has the players feeling stronger than ever before.

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cartier Martin, K-State's 6-foot-7 senior swingman, doesn't look like Weight Watchers material.

Still, strength coach Scott Greenawalt said Martin came into the offseason carrying a few extra pounds.

"His body fat after the season was very, very high," Greenawalt said.

That's where Greenawalt came in. The imposing line-backer-turned-strength coach helped Martin and the Wildcats shape up with a steady diet of weight training.

The goal was to mold this K-State team in the image of coach Bob Huggins' great Cincinnati squads: strong, fast and physical.

The first step? Getting rid of that excess body fat.

"You move faster and don't get as tired when you shed off that unused fat," Greenawalt said. "You're definitely more flexible when it comes to playing 40 minutes a game."

Beginning in May, the team endured grueling workouts with Greenawalt, who trained Cincinnati teams for seven years.

Intense offseason training isn't uncommon in college basketball. However, many teams scale back their workout regimens once the season starts.

Not so at K-State. The Wildcats continued lifting three or four times a week during the season.

That's a sharp contrast to last season, when K-State's in-season lifting sessions were infrequent at best.

"We lifted once a week, maybe," junior David Hoskins said. "The coaches didn't want to wear us out."

"Coach Huggins isn't too worried about that."

Unorthodox? Perhaps. Still, it's hard to argue with the results.

"We're a better team. We're definitely a tougher team," Hoskins said.

K-State's opponents have noticed the difference. Just ask Chicago State coach Kevin Jones, who watched his team get manhandled by the Wildcats 73-36 on Jan. 22.

"I thought this was the most physical team we've played all year," Jones said. "We've played a lot of teams, but no one was aggressive in every area like Kansas State, and it just wore us down."

High praise, considering Chicago State played at Michigan State, California, Wichita State and Indiana.

It's the kind of praise typically bestowed upon Huggins' Cincinnati teams, routinely acknowledged as some of the most physical in college basketball.

Greenawalt arrived at Cincinnati in 1999 as a strength training intern. Soon after, he took over as head trainer for Huggins' basketball team.

"He said, 'I want you training my team,'" Greenawalt recalled. "Ever since then, we've seen eye-to-eye on how our guys need to train. It's a benefit to me because there are only two or three basketball coaches I'd want to work for, and he's one of them."

Clearly, the feeling is mutual. When Huggins landed at K-State, he said Greenawalt was "part of the deal."

"I've said many times I think he's the best strength coach in America," Huggins said. "He's terrific. He brings great knowledge and great passion. Because of his passion, it becomes infectious."

It certainly appears the Wildcats have bought into Greenawalt's philosophy. Still, adjusting to the new workout routine took some time. Specifically, players weren't accustomed to lifting before practice.

"I think it was a little bit different for them," Greenawalt said. "We always train before practice, and they might be a little tight afterwards. I think they've adjusted."

Indeed, the hard work seems to be paying off for the Wildcats. They've won six straight conference games, five of them by 10 points or less.

In doing so, the Wildcats seem to have adopted the mentality that defined Huggins' Cincinnati teams.

ATMOSPHERE | Outsiders take notice of added excitement, improved attendance at Bramlage

The group printed sheets of paper with chant instructions for students at the last two home games.

Each sheet also requests to stay after the game for Huggins' post-game radio interview.

"A lot of the things we've been doing have been catching on like wildfire," Garcia said. "At the game (against Nebraska), not a lot of people stuck around, but at the (Missouri game), a lot of people stuck around."

Garcia said the group is trying to teach K-State students how to be more effective basketball fans.

"There's kind of been a losing attitude in the basketball program, and I think that a lot of the students just buy season tickets to go to the KU game," Garcia said. "Lately, in the past couple games, the students are really showing up and have taken to heart what Huggins has said about showing up to the games and not doing things half-heartedly."

It hasn't taken long for the change to be noticed. Chris Piper, color commentator for the Jayhawk Radio network and former Kansas basketball player, said that the atmosphere at the Missouri game was a 180-degree turn from what he has come to expect at Bramlage.

"It was the loudest that I've heard it up there," Piper said. "It kind of reminded me of the days at Ahearn."

Before Kansas played Texas A&M Saturday, Piper was quoted as saying that the loudest place he had been all year was Bramlage during the Missouri game.

Weinman said that due to the success Huggins has already brought to the program, she isn't worried about attendance or atmosphere in the future.

"When students come to Bramlage knowing the Cats are going to win, the atmosphere will improve on its own," Weinman said.

Men's update

ATM 1. No. 6 Texas A&M — The Aggies took over first place in the Big 12 Conference last week with a 69-66 victory over Kansas Saturday. Senior Acie Law IV hit a 3-pointer over sophomore Brandon Rush with 20 seconds left to help the Aggies prevail. A&M won 12 of its last 13 games.

2. No. 9 Kansas — The Jayhawks lost their only game last week to Texas A&M. The victory was the first for any South Division team in Allen Fieldhouse since the advent of the Big 12 in 1996. The Jayhawks are still in good shape to make a run for the Big 12 title.

3. K-State — The Wildcats got a much-needed boost to their tournament résumé Saturday when they traveled to Texas and beat the No. 22 Longhorns 73-72. K-State, one of the worst shooting teams in the Big 12, made 14-of-27 3-point attempts. The win solidified K-State as a legitimate Big 12 contender.

2. Texas — The Longhorns lost at home to K-State Saturday despite another superb performance by freshman Kevin Durant, who had 32 points and nine rebounds against the Wildcats. Texas is still in the Big 12 hunt, but will have to prove itself against the other talented teams in the conference.

5. No. 17 Oklahoma State — The Cowboys suffered an 89-77 loss Saturday at Colorado. OSU trailed the entire game and looked sluggish. The Cowboys are talented, but have yet to win a conference game on the road. If they hope to stay in contention in the Big 12, they must find a way to win away from home.

6. Texas Tech — The Red Raiders lost at home to Texas 76-64 Wednesday and followed that with a road loss to Oklahoma 75-61 Saturday. Texas Tech lost by double digits three games in a row. The Red Raiders have been an inconsistent team that can't seem to find its true identity. Their schedule will not get any easier, so they must improve their play quickly.

6. Oklahoma — The Sooners beat Texas Tech Saturday to even their Big 12 record at 4-4. Two of their next three games are on the road, and the Sooners haven't won a conference road game this year. Junior Longar Longar showed his potential with 19 points and 14 rebounds against Texas Tech.

8. Iowa State — The Cyclones broke their five-game losing streak with a 71-58 victory over Baylor Saturday. Iowa State is a young squad that appears to be in a rebuilding year under first-year coach Greg McDermott. Freshman Wesley Johnson continues to promise the Cyclones a bright future, scoring 14 points and grabbing 10 rebounds in the victory over Baylor.

9. Nebraska — The Huskers got their first road conference victory with a 66-61 win over Missouri Saturday. The win also stopped a three-game losing streak.

10. Missouri — The Tigers followed up their loss to K-State on Wednesday with a home loss to Nebraska Saturday. Missouri seems to be in a rebuilding year under first-year coach Greg McDermott. Freshman Wesley Johnson continues to promise the Cyclones a bright future, scoring 14 points and grabbing 10 rebounds in the victory over Baylor.

11. Baylor — The Bears lost to Iowa State Saturday and 71-58. Freshman Demond "Tweety" Carter has not played well lately. Carter scored only three points in 32 minutes against Iowa State.

11. Colorado — The Buffaloes got their biggest win of the season Saturday, defeating Oklahoma State 89-77. Freshman Kalvin Bay tied a career high with 21 points. Colorado had lost its last three games by double digits before the win over the Cowboys.

5 KEYS TO VICTORY WOMEN

By Dayne Logan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

1. SHARE THE ROCK

The Wildcats shot the ball just one less time than Texas, but were unable to convert because of poor distribution. Texas' 24 assists were indicative of its ability find open shots, while K-State's 10 assists showed the opposite.

2. SCORE INSIDE

The Wildcats were an abysmal 0-of-14 from behind the 3-point line Saturday. Because of the inconsistency that comes with shooting a lot of 3's, the Wildcats need to try taking the ball to the hole more often.

3. FIX FREE THROWS

In the last three games, K-State has been horrendous from the foul line, making just 18-of-34 attempts. Whether it is a lack of confidence or just bad luck, the Wildcats need to find their strokes in a hurry to keep any hope of a post-season berth alive.

4. CONTAIN THE K'S

Nebraska's Kelsey Griffin and Kiera Hardy have given opposing coaches nightmares all season long. Griffin averages 16.4 points and 8.7 rebounds per game, while Hardy is contributing 15.9 points of her own. All the Wildcats need to have a huge game defensively if they want to avoid another blowout.

5. TAKE IT TO TECH

The Red Raiders are 14-9 and have struggled to find offensive consistency for most of the season. If K-State catches Tech on one of its off days, the Wildcats might be able to come away with a victory.

MEN

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

1. CONTROL THE POST

The Wildcats can't expect to hit 14 3-pointers like they did against Texas. They'll need points in the paint from junior David Hoskins and the two freshmen, Jason Bennett and Luis Colon.

2. GUARD THE 3-SPOT

Senior Akeem Wright played well against Texas freshman Kevin Durant Saturday. He will need a repeat performance against Kansas' Brandon Rush and Colorado's Richard Roby this week.

3. KEEP HARRIS HOT

Senior Lance Harris can be streaky, but he has the ability to carry K-State. He will provide a huge lift to the Wildcats if he can be more consistent.

4. DICTATE TEMPO

K-State knocked off KU in Lawrence last year by slowing the tempo and keeping the score low. K-State needs to continue keeping games in the 50- or 60-point range.

5. AVOID LETDOWN

K-State has played well lately, but even the slightest letdown could spell disaster against a talented KU team. Meanwhile, the Wildcats will be coming off two huge road games when they entertain Colorado, the worst team in the Big 12, Saturday.

Women's update

1. No. 12 Oklahoma — Texas defeated the Sooners 67-62 Wednesday in Austin, Texas — their second-straight loss. The Sooners beat Oklahoma State Saturday 78-63. Sophomore Courtney Paris grabbed her 49th straight double-double, with 41 points and 19 rebounds.

2. No. 21 Nebraska — Sophomore Kelsey Griffin led the way in Nebraska's 62-49 win over Iowa State Wednesday with 15 points. Nebraska went on to upset No. 15 Baylor 76-67 in Lincoln, Neb., Saturday. Griffin once again led the Huskers with 23 points and 13 rebounds, and senior Kiera Hardy added 19.

3. No. 16 Texas A&M — Sophomore Danielle Gant hit the game-winning free throw to give the Aggies a 64-63 victory over Oklahoma State Tuesday. On Saturday, junior Patrice Read scored 18 points, and Gant had 15 points and 10 rebounds in a 64-53 victory over Kansas — the Aggies' fourth-straight conference win.

4. No. 15 Baylor — The Bears beat Missouri 71-70 Wednesday. Junior Jhasmin Player scored 11 points in the second half, and led Baylor with a career-high 21 points. The Bears then beat Nebraska 76-67. Angela Tisdale paced the Bears with 18 points.

5. Texas — Senior Tiffany Jackson had 22 points and 13 rebounds in the Longhorns' 67-62 win over Oklahoma Wednesday. Texas then dominated K-State 61-34, and Jackson and junior Emeisha Bailey led the Longhorns with 12 points apiece.

6. Texas Tech — The Lady Raiders beat Kansas 66-65 Wednesday. Senior Alesha Robertson scored 20 points in the game. Robertson again paced the Raiders with 21 points and nine rebounds in another close game, a 70-67 loss at Colorado Saturday.

7. Iowa State — The Cyclones lost 62-49 to Nebraska Wednesday and recovered Sunday against Missouri with a 76-68 victory. Sophomore Nicky Wieben led the Cyclones with a career-high 24 points.

8. Colorado — Colorado overcame a 15-point halftime deficit against K-State to win 66-55. Senior Jasmina Ilic scored a game-high 27 points in a 70-67 win over Texas Tech Saturday. Junior Jackie McFarland added 10 points and nine rebounds.

9. K-State — At Colorado, the Wildcats lost 66-55 Wednesday, and were destroyed 61-34 Saturday against Texas. K-State struggled offensively, failing to score a 3-point basket for the first time since 2003.

10. Oklahoma State — OSU loss to Texas A&M Wednesday, and dropped Saturday's matchup with Oklahoma. On Saturday, senior Rashidat Sadiq led the team with 16 points.

11. Missouri — The Tigers lost 71-70 at Baylor Wednesday. Senior EeTisha Riddle had 26 points and 11 rebounds. The Tigers then fell to the Iowa State 78-68 Sunday.

12. Kansas — The Jayhawks lost to Texas Tech 66-65 Wednesday. Senior Shaquana Mosley finished with 18 points, 11 assists and nine rebounds. She had 10 points and 10 assists in a 64-53 loss to Texas A&M Saturday.

ROAD TRIP: LAWRENCE

All you need to know to have a good time before, after watching K-State play Kansas

University of Kansas

- Founded: 1866
- Enrollment: 29,272
- Mascot: Baby Jay. The original 3-D mascot was simply "Jay" starting in the 1960s, but during 1971's Homecoming, a huge egg was brought to the 50-yard line, and "Baby Jay" was hatched.
- ① Allen Fieldhouse, with a capacity of 16,300, widely is considered to be among the best places to watch college basketball in the nation. Tours of Allen Fieldhouse are given upon availability of a guide. Tours are generally about one hour. For more information, call (785) 864-3355.

Facts about Lawrence

- Population: 81,604
- Location: 30 minutes west of Kansas City, Mo., and 20 minutes east of Topeka
- Boyhood home of famous writer/poet Langston Hughes
- USA Today ranked Lawrence one of the least segregated communities in the country
- Streets in Lawrence are named after states in the order they joined the Union, starting with Delaware

Bars

If you are looking for good beer, cheap prices or entertainment, you won't be disappointed in any of these selections.

- ② Abe & Jake's Landing
Voted "Best Overall Bar" by Kansas students in 2002. Nationally known for having a strong influence on the music industry, Abe & Jake's has been host to music talent like John Mayer and O.A.R. before they got their big breaks.
Where: 8 E. Sixth St.
Phone: (785) 841-5855

- ③ Red Lyon Tavern
A comfortable European style pub — a terrific place to relax and catch some games on TV. Shoot some darts, enjoy a variety of ales and munch on free popcorn.
Where: 944 Massachusetts St.
Phone: (785) 832-8228

- ④ Louise's Downtown
A spacious two-floor bar, the upstairs opens at 11 p.m. Louise's has daily drink specials and live music on Saturdays. Louise's offers a heated smoking area to customers (remember, Lawrence has a smoking ban).

18-year-old found dead in home

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An 18-year-old Manhattan man's father found him dead in his bedroom Tuesday, said Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department.

"Nothing looks like foul play here," Quintanar said.

Sam Fattaey, 2103 Abbot Circle, was found at 7:45 p.m., Quintanar said.

The RCPD received a call from the residence stating Fattaey wasn't breathing, he said.

Upon arrival, officers discovered Fattaey was in cardiac arrest and began performing CPR.

Fattaey was taken to Mercy Health Center, 1823 College Ave., but could not be revived.

There were reports that Fattaey had medical problems at a younger age, but it is unknown if that might have played a part in his death, Quintanar said.

An autopsy is scheduled to find the cause of death, Quintanar said.

Lecturer to speak about global warming

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Larry Schweiger, Executive Director of the National Wildlife Federation, will speak as part of the Lou Douglas Lectures Series at 7 p.m. today in Forum Hall.

Schweiger will address global warming and how it affects our world, focusing specifically on how the trend is influencing the wildlife populations and wetlands, said Linda Teener, executive director of UFM Community Learning Center.

According to the UFM Web site, Schweiger served eight years as President and CEO of Western Pennsylvania Conservancy prior to being named Executive Director of the NWF in 2004.

Schweiger helped expand ecological research and increase visibility for WPC through his work on many promotional and community projects.

Schweiger also served as vice president of the Chesapeake Bay Foundation, as well as publishing magazines and leading affiliate and regional programs for the NWF on an earlier tour that lasted from 1981 to 1995.

Schweiger is a co-chair of the Governing Council of the Alliance for Climate Protection.

Teener encouraged students and faculty to attend the lecture with an open mind, saying, "Global warming is something we all need to be more concerned about."

She also suggested looking up the showing dates on the K-State Web site for "An Inconvenient Truth," a film to be shown periodically in the next few months by K-State's Campaign for Nonviolence.

The Lou Douglas Lecture is free of charge and open to the public.

FDA declares food products from cloned animals safe for consumption

By Stephanie Gorges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ten years after the Dolly the sheep became the first successfully cloned animal, the United States is on the verge of introducing food products from cloned animals into the food supply.

In December, the Food and Drug Administration ruled that the meat and milk of cloned cattle, pigs and goats are as safe to consume as that of conventionally bred animals.

FDA scientists conducted and reviewed studies on cloned and conventionally bred animals from the last ten years. They concluded in "Animal Cloning: A Draft Risk Assessment" that not only are the food products safe, but also cloning is no more dangerous or harmful than any other reproductive technology.

In 2001, K-State successfully cloned its first animal, Chloe, a calf created from an especially productive cow in K-State's purebred beef research center. More than five years later, Chloe is still healthy and has even produced calves of her own, said David Grieger, associate professor of animal sciences and industry.

"It was from a Hereford cow that produced valuable calves for the breed, so it made sense to clone one of the most productive cows in the herd," he said.

According to the FDA's assessment, there is still a fairly low rate of success in cloning animals, but once the animals are born, they have almost as high a survival rate as other animals.

"There do tend to be some abnormalities in the offspring, but most of those are lost before they are born, so they don't show up," said Duane Davis, professor in animal sciences and industry. "With cattle, the biggest problem has been what's called a large calf syndrome, where the calves might weigh 25 to 30 percent more than what they would normally."

Abnormalities in cloned animals and the fact that cloned animals are not born naturally are two of the main concerns consumers may have with cloned animals, Davis said.

Sean Fox, professor of agricultural economics, said a study published by the University of Maryland in December revealed people's hesitancy to consume cloned food products.

"About two-thirds of people surveyed said they would be hesitant about the product," Fox said. "I think some people will fear it, but I don't think the numbers will be as big as the survey suggests."

Releasing the findings in the risk assessment is only step one for the FDA. The organization will seek comments from the public and livestock professionals for the next 90 days before making an official legal ruling. Until then, the organization has asked farmers, ranchers and breeders to refrain from putting cloned products on the market.

Fox said even if the FDA does legalize selling cloned food products, only a small percentage of the meat and milk in the system actually will be from cloned animals because the animals are too expensive to slaughter.

"The cloning will probably be used first for reproducing, so a very productive bull or cow would be reproduced," he said. "They could at the end of their life end up in the food system for sure, but they would be a very small part of it."

Consumers already are questioning whether or not cloned products will be labeled as such and how expensive the products will be.

Davis said until cloning technology becomes more efficient, not enough clones will be produced to make much of an effect on the food supply. But once animals producing top-quality meat can be reproduced easily, he expects the costs will increase.

SGA members meet with legislators in Topeka

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

TOPEKA — Student Governing Association members from Kansas Board of Regents universities spoke with legislators about deferred maintenance at the Capitol Wednesday.

About 10 K-State students attended Higher Education Day in Topeka and spoke in support of Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' proposal to fund deferred maintenance at the schools. Among the six Regents universities, K-State leads in deferred maintenance with more than $254 million.

Sebelius announced her multi-year, four-part proposal Jan. 31 to address $665 million in deferred maintenance at Regents universities. Sebelius' Foundations for the Future proposal must pass through the Kansas House of Representatives and Senate before she signs or vetoes it.

While SGA members from all six Regents universities spoke in favor of Sebelius' proposal to state House and Senate legislators, several legislators spoke against the proposal.

Rep. John Faber, R-Brewster, said although he does not know what proposal will be selected, he doubts Sebelius' proposal will be passed.

"I don't know what we're going to do, but I doubt we're going to do that," said Faber, who also is a House Education Budget Committee member. "We're probably going to do a multi-year plan of some kind — that's what I'm hearing."

Sen. Jean Kurtis Schodorf, R-Wichita, said the legislature should attempt to solve funding deferred maintenance this session. Schodorf is chair of the Senate Higher Education Task Force, which planned to finalize an alternative funding report on Wednesday, she said. Among other things, the report proposes a single, ongoing source of revenue for deferred maintenance, such as gaming, she said.

"Everything changes around here — you put out a plan, some people hate it or love it or whatever, but at least you try," Schodorf said.

It is not unusual for one issue to be the focus of discussion at Higher Education Day, said Matt King, chairman of K-State's Governmental Relations Committee.

"Students are motivated about this particular issue," King, senior in political science, said. "Deferred maintenance is at the top of the list. It's an almost $1 billion problem, and we want to get it taken care of."

Lucas Maddy, K-State student body president, said the day served as a refresher course in deferred maintenance for the legislators.

Vet-Med researchers approve new vaccine

Researchers from K-State's College of Veterinary Medicine completed a study showing that a newly developed vaccine is effective against a deadly viral disease that is affecting swine herds in Kansas. Ranchers first recognized the disease in Kansas swine herds in Nov. 2005.

Tony-winning musical comes to McCain

K-State's McCain Performance Series will present the five-time Tony award-winning musical "Man of La Mancha" at 7:30 p.m. Feb. 14. This Broadway musical presents the quest of Don Quixote, told by Miguel de Cervantes to his fellow prisoners as he awaits the Inquisition.

Students nominated for Truman scholarship

K-State is nominating three students to compete for $30,000 Harry S. Truman scholarships. The nominees are Greg Corbin, Jenna Kennedy and Molly Kuhlman. Students selected as Truman finalists will interview in Kansas City in mid-March, and winners will be announced by early April.

Toll increase

A recent Collegian online poll asked readers what they thought of Gov. Sebelius' plan to use a turnpike toll increase to fund deferred maintenance.

This poll is not scientific and reflects the opinions of only those Internet users who have chosen to participate.

Boost romance, heart-felt emotions

By Stephanie Gorges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jewelry store ads are popping up everywhere, girls are casually mentioning how much they love chocolates, and the shelves of Wal-Mart are bursting with enough pink to make even Barbie nauseous.

This can mean only one thing: Valentine's Day is almost here. So boost your romance knowledge (and find some inspiration!) with these cinematic classics.

1. Which romantic movie did not win an Academy Award for best picture?

- a. "Gone with the Wind"
b. "From Here to Eternity"
c. "The Sound of Music"
d. "It Happened One Night"

2. "Sleepless in Seattle" based its famous Empire State Building scene on this 1957 film starring Cary Grant and Deborah Kerr.

- a. "To Have and Have Not"
b. "An Affair to Remember"
c. "Love Story"
d. "The Philadelphia Story"

3. Which soundtrack hit did not reach No. 1 on the Billboard Hot 100?

- a. "Up Where We Belong" from "An Officer and a Gentleman"
b. "I Will Always Love You" from "The Bodyguard"
c. "My Heart Will Go On" from "Titanic"
d. "The Sound of Music"

4. Which romance is not based on a novel by Jane Austen?

- a. "Romancing the Stone"
b. "Emma"
c. "Pride and Prejudice"
d. "Sense and Sensibility"

5. Which film was not based on a novel?

- a. "The Princess Bride"
b. "Edward Scissorhands"
c. "The Notebook"
d. "Shopgirl"

Illustration by Donnie Lee

0-1 correct: Romance might not be your genre of choice, but take some hints from these films if you want to impress your special someone this year.

2-4 correct: You know your romantic movies, but you don't live in them. Treat yourself to one of these classics with your sweetheart or roommates.

5 correct: You've been struck by Cupid's arrow — apparently more than once. Valentine's Day will be a perfect opportunity to let your hopeless romanticism shine.

K-State presents Pulitzer Prize-winning production

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Michael Gros wanted his first production as a faculty member at K-State not only to reflect Kansas heritage, but also to represent something new and different for collegiate theater.

Gros, assistant professor of speech communication, is directing "Dark at the Top of the Stairs," which opens at 8 tonight in Nichols Theatre. The play was written by native Kansan William Inge, and has not been done before at the college level.

"Dark at the Top of the Stairs" is a Pulitzer-Prize winning play that enters the lives of the Floods, an Oklahoma family in the 1920s, following their transition from a "rural environment to a modern lifestyle full of technology," Gros said.

It is a classic American play from the Golden American Naturalistic Theater, loosely based off of Inge's childhood.

"The play examines issues such as struggling to find a place in the world and working to embrace a new lifestyle, which I feel every person can connect with, in some form or another," Gros said. "This is a chance for the audience to explore the generality of this type of theater as well as the universality of the play."

Many hours of dedication from more than 20 K-State students have made this production a possibility. Mary Johnston, graduate student in theatre and costume design, leads the costume design crew for the production. She and her designers and stitchers have each put in roughly 40 hours per week for the past few weeks to complete the costumes for the set.

"A fun part of the costume design process for this particular play was to correctly match the styles of the time period," Johnston said. "I know I have a great group of people working to make this happen. It's important to recognize those working behind the scenes, as well as the actors."

Other members of the production team include Kurtis Rutherford and Sarah Gilmore, both graduate students in speech. Rutherford is in charge of designing the scenery, and Gilmore is heading up the lighting and sound design.

"Dark" also involves nine actors who have "(rehearsed) intensely since Jan. 3rd," said Marci Maullar, associate professor of speech communication, theater and dance.

Following the Feb. 15 performance of "Dark at the Top of the Stairs," Peter Ellenstein, director of the the William Inge Theatre Festival, is hosting a talk-back session for the public in Nichols Theatre.

Lyndsey Born | COLLEGIAN

George Stavropoulos, senior in theater, watches Kathleen Stout, sophomore in family studies and human services and Brett Culbert, junior in theater, as they react to a game during the dress rehearsal of "Dark at the Top of the Stairs" at Nichols Theatre Tuesday evening.

Gros encouraged students, faculty, and the public to attend one of the many showings of "Dark at the Top of the Stairs," explaining that it has something to offer everyone.

"While it is principally a drama, there is humor, and viewers will be left with a feeling of hope, which is a wonderful tonic in our modern times," Gros said.

The play runs at 8 p.m. today through Sunday, as well as Feb. 14-17.

Board of Education accepts proposals for redistricting

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Board of Education took first action Wednesday night to unanimously accept two proposals — plans for redistricting and wellness implementation.

Board members voted to accept on the redistricting proposal, plan B5B, set forth by the Redistricting Committee. This proposal will send 218 students to Bluemont Elementary School when it reopens for the 2007-08 school year.

Residents voiced concerns about the increase in travel time to and from Bluemont School and about the disruption in students' lives and education.

Cristiana Piccinni, graduate student in human ecology, has a daughter in fourth grade who will be transferred Bluemont under the plan accepted by the board. It will be her daughter's fifth elementary school.

"When we moved (to Manhattan), we were just hoping we could stay at one school and have some stability," Piccinni said.

Piccinni suggested board members consider a grandfather clause that would exempt fifth- and sixth-grade students from the redistricting plan.

Board member Walt Pesaresi said his initial reluctance to support the plan stemmed from the lack of action taken to equalize the number of students and socioeconomic levels at Manhattan's two middle schools.

As of Sept. 20, 2006, Eisenhower Middle School had 309 students, and Anthony Middle School enrolled 386, according to district records. Eisenhower also has 16 percent more students of lower socioeconomic status.

"(The redistricting plan) does not contain a proposal equalizing out and doing something I think is very necessary at the two middle schools," Pesaresi said. "B5B is by far the best plan, but its shortfall is the lack of administration recommendation to do something with the feeder schools to Eisenhower and Anthony."

The board also unanimously voted for initial acceptance of the nutrition plank of the district's wellness implementation plan.

The district piloted non-sugar cereals at Amanda Arnold, Theodore Roosevelt and Ogden Elementary Schools with mixed results. Donna Keyser, district food service director, said.

The total number of students eating breakfast at the three schools has not changed, but cereal consumption has decreased, Keyser said.

Also down is the sale of a la carte items on the high school campuses, Keyser said. Monthly sales figures have dropped since the removal of less healthy items, like doughnuts, from the menu.

Stress, bipolar symptoms related

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Staying up all night to study, worrying about grades and dealing with other stressors common to college students might be triggering symptoms in students with a psychiatric disorder.

Many people with bipolar disorder, also known as manic depression, first remember experiencing symptoms during their college years, according to a recent study conducted by Harris Interactive and sponsored by AstraZeneca.

In the study, interviews of 506 diagnosed bipolar sufferers revealed the mean age of 20 as when sufferers first remember experiencing symptoms.

"We do see a lot of people with bipolar disorder," said Supavan Brown, psychology intern at University Counseling Services. "When people get to this age in their life, they might be experiencing more stress, less sleep and exposure to alcohol or drugs."

Although these stressors do not cause bipolar disorder, they can act as triggers for the dramatic mood swings that charac-terize this type of depression.

"It's something that a person has, and during periods of stress, these symptoms will manifest themselves," said Charles Drees, program director for prevention education and consultation at Pawnee Mental Health Services.

Drees said the change of environment from home to school could be enough to trigger symptoms. People are leaving the structure a home provides as well as their support system.

Andrew Massing, junior in agricultural education, said he understands why college could manifest symptoms of manic depression.

"If it's stressful enough for someone who doesn't struggle from bipolar disorder, I could see how it could be extremely hard for someone with the disorder," Massing said.

Bipolar disorder can be dangerous. It brings severe highs and lows to its sufferers' moods, much more drastic than common mood swings.

During a high, or manic episode, sufferers' moods are elevated. A person could feel extremely happy or irritable; they might not want to sleep, and could be abnormally talkative and sociable, Brown said.

"They really have this sense they can do anything," Brown said. "This can be dangerous because people might not have a realistic idea of what they can really do, and they may put themselves in a situation where they are at risk."

Depression episodes are equally as dangerous as the highs. Seventy-nine percent of bipolar disorder sufferers ages 18 to 29 admitted to thoughts of death or suicide in a recent survey.

Sufferers could lose pleasure in daily activities and experience low self-esteem, Brown said. They also could be socially withdrawn and constantly tired.

Brown said it is important to be on the lookout for signs of manic depression among friends, so it can be treated.

"If it's not treated, it can sometimes lead to some pretty serious stuff," Brown said. "It's important as a friend to pay attention and really listen and help that friend get some professional help. People who are treated for bipolar disorder can be very successful."

Discrimination leads to unequal rights

"Faggot."
I froze as the word echoed, as if no one would notice me turning crimson. The blood pulsed loudly in my ears as I turned slowly to look at him. My boss' eyes were on the floor but only for a moment. Lifting his head up and setting his shoulders back, he took a breath and fixed his eyes on the door.

LEAH SAND

It wasn't until we were outside that he said, "So much for a nice, quiet lunch." That was all he said that day.

This was my first experience with blatant discrimination toward a homosexual. We hear things on the news – the death of Matthew Shepard, Isaiah Washington using homophobic slurs, Fred Phelps holding "God Hates Fags" signs – this is a reality for us all. What some of us do not know, though, is what this means and what it feels like.

I felt it that hot summer afternoon in Texas, and I am reminded every time homosexuals are denied civil rights in this country.

According to The Associated Press, on Feb. 2, Michigan courts reversed a 2005 ruling allowing same-sex couples basic benefits under the law. The ruling in Michigan screams what the government has been hinting at for years: Homosexuals, though "equal" citizens of this country, cannot and should not have the same rights as heterosexuals.

Now, instead of having civil rights under law, gays and lesbians are left in the dust.

CNN Headline News broadcast responses to the recent appeal. A cognizant, perky blonde reporter conducting interviews found most were sad and upset, and some were not. In the midst of this, dissenters spoke up – one of whom was Phelps.

Phelps, though extreme, represents those in society who perpetuate negative stereotypes. Some believe homosexuals will lead to our moral decay. Most marriage traditionalists agree, and while concerns of societies' morals are valid, science does not back up the claim.

According to a report from the American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry, "sexual orientation is unrelated to judgment, stability, reliability or vocational capability." Hence, granting civil rights to homosexuals will not lead to the collapse of humankind.

By allocating civil rights to all citizens, we will instill a compassion for all humankind, regardless of race, religion, gender, gender identity or sexual orientation. Aren't compassion and acceptance symptoms of a moral, righteous society?

Instead of imparting different rights to different groups, we should be accepting and understanding of all God's children. Or are we a society that lacks empathy and is quick to throw the first stone?

By denying civil rights to gays, the government is throwing the first stone, supporting every negative connotation associated with homosexuals.

Standing in that Texas deli on a sweltering August day, I felt the stone hit. I felt the words punch me; I felt the damage and embarrassment; I felt it knocking me down. It was as if a child brought a gun to school and fired it off in the middle of the classroom.

In the midst of all the mute clatter, my boss, even though judging eyes followed him, walked out of the door with dignity. Whenever a homophobic insult is uttered or another law denies civil rights to gays, I am reminded of that day and what it felt like.

Beware of city

Care of animals should fall to owners, not government

There's quite a stir about the controversial dog ordinances being discussed by the City of Manhattan.

According to an article published in the Manhattan Mercury on Jan. 29, the proposed revisions to the "dangerous dog" ordinance include "defining a dozen specific breeds of dog as dangerous. Owners of dogs defined as dangerous would be required to keep the animals confined or leashed, muzzled and controlled. Owners would also be required to post 'beware of dog' signs on their property and would pay a higher registration fee (for the dog)."

The list of requirements for "dangerous" dogs doesn't end there. The owners also would be required to keep $100,000 in liability insurance, micro-chip their dog(s) in case they became lost; and spay or neuter the animal.

These regulations to contain a "dangerous" dog – which raises the issue of who, exactly, decides if a dog is dangerous – are very costly to the pet owner. Although the City of Manhattan simply is trying to keep its citizens safe from out-of-control dogs, it should be up to the owner to properly train the dog.

The city will end up enforcing policies on "dangerous" breeds, even though the individual dog might not be dangerous at all.

A later article on the issue published Jan. 31 said it could cost as much as $2,300 for dog owners to complete all the requirements under the new ordinance.

Required spaying and neutering, also could put a dent in dog owners' pockets, because some might use their dog for breeding, and therefore, income.

Many students and community members do not approve of the ban. Jessica Lutz, sophomore in hotel and restaurant management, said she feels the regulations unfairly target certain breeds.

"My neighbor has a pit bull, and it is the sweetest dog," Lutz said. "It has never been mean to anyone. It's not fair that they are judging a dog by its breed and not its behavior."

"If a specific dog has a history of being violent, then they should take precautions to protect people. But if they are targeting a dog because it is a Rottweiler or pit bull, then it is unfair to the owners and their dogs."

Even though there probably are dangerous dogs in Manhattan, the emphasis of the legislation should be placed on proper training and handling education, not strict control for owners who could have well-behaved dogs.

Stereotyping certain dog breeds instead of focusing on those dogs that have histories of violence is not the proper way to handle the issue.

Instead of spending money on efforts to control dogs within city limits, the funds should go toward free or reduced public dog-training classes.

No one wants to live in a neighborhood or city where he or she has to pass or handle a dangerous dog, but with education and training – not confinement and insurance – those dogs have the potential to become well-mannered pets and friends to their neighbors.

Cloned animals not necessary to sustain U.S. food supply

Cloned beef? No, thank you.

The FDA's recent approval of cloned animals for introduction into the food supply offers no direct or immediate benefit to the general carnivorous public.

Already our beef is plentiful. Kansas is second in the nation for the number of beef cattle on feedlots with 2.3 million head, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, and the total number of feedlots with a capacity of 1,000 or more head is 10.7 million nationwide.

Also, cloned animals produce offspring with genetic abnormalities, as attested by K-State's own experts, so the long-term viability of cloned beef cattle is limited at best.

Certainly the element of cost does not work in its favor. Anything that is experimental and lab-intensive isn't likely to be economical. Reasonably priced cloned beef still is years away.

Petri-dish burgers also are not likely to taste any better than your average mass-produced cow. Their genes might be strong, but it's the way they're raised and fed that ultimately affect their sapidity.

If you're looking for superior taste or redeeming nutritive value, try grass-fed beef as an alternative to feedlot cattle, whose meat often is laced with antibiotics. Beef from cows that are allowed to graze is lower in calories and fat and higher in omega-3 fatty acids. For its slightly higher grocery store price tag, at least grass-fed offers some quantifiable benefits.

To date, cloned meat has shown no such benefits. Perhaps down the line it will be practical to have of pens of cows with identical genes, but ultimately, it won't improve the condition of the pot roast sitting on our dinner table.

Setting aside the debate over the ethical soundness of cloning, currently, there is no reason to support the introduction of cloned meat into our food supply.

Cloned products pose no more harm than current choices

Which tastes better, milk from a normal cow or milk from a cloned cow?

Does it really matter? As long it's safe for human consumption, our Lucky Charms will remain magically delicious, regardless of how the source animal was created.

Every time the issue of cloning surfaces, memories of "Blade Runner" and "Brave New World" taint the arguments of what should be a purely scientific discussion.

Cloning has so many potential uses that to write it off based on a preliminary moral dilemma would not only be illogical, it would be irresponsible.

Epidemics such as mad cow disease could create shortages, and it might be necessary to duplicate a large number of safe animals.

Also, as the world's population increases, it might be necessary to create animals with higher nutritional value.

The pursuit of the perfect cow could yield an animal that produces more milk and more meat while taking up the same amount of corral space.

Since cloning the first tadpole in 1952, scientists have come a long way in understanding genetics, as well as finding better uses for the information.

Opponents might claim the technology is too expensive and the success rate is too low to make cloning a practical field of study, but without a wealth of experimentation, researchers never will be able to streamline the process.

The FDA thoroughly researched the safety of cloned food, so there's no need to fear cloned products that might eventually appear in our supermarkets.

Whether cloning is morally wrong or not, the potential benefits are too valuable to ignore. In the future, our nation might need to use all the options at its disposal and worrying whether a cloned cow has a soul or not will have no effect on your genetically engineered hamburger.

U.S. HELICOPTER CRASHES NORTHWEST OF BAGHDAD

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A U.S. Marine transport helicopter crashed in flames Wednesday in a field northwest of Baghdad, killing all seven people aboard, the U.S. military said. It was the fifth U.S. aircraft lost in less than three weeks and the latest sign of growing problems with aviation in Iraq.

A U.S. military statement gave no reason for the crash of the CH-46 Sea Knight, which went down near Fallujah in Anbar province, about 20 miles from Baghdad. However, at the Pentagon, three Marine Corps officials said the troop-transport helicopter was in flames when it went down, with the pilot appearing to attempt a hasty landing but losing control as the aircraft descended.

They said witnesses in nearby Marine aircraft saw the flames but saw no sign that it involved hostile fire.

An Iraqi air force officer, however, said the helicopter was downed by an anti-aircraft missile. He spoke in anonymity because he was not authorized to release information.

SHOOTING ERUPTS ON ISRAEL-LEBANON BORDER

JERUSALEM — Fighting broke out between Israeli and Lebanese soldiers Wednesday night as Israel searched for Hezbollah bombs along the frontier between the two countries, officials from both sides said.

Lebanese soldiers opened fire and Israeli troops responded with tanks and light weapons, Israeli security officials said on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the media.

Lebanese military officials said their troops opened fire with machine guns on a bulldozer after the vehicle crossed the so-called Blue Line — the U.N.-demarcated boundary — and entered about 20 yards into Lebanon.

It was the first time shooting erupted across the border since shortly after a cease-fire on Aug. 14 ended a 34-day summer war between Israeli forces and the Lebanese Hezbollah militants.

OPTIMISM SURROUNDS NORTH KOREA NUKE TALK

BEIJING — International talks on North Korea's nuclear program convene today with a new sense of optimism about the possibility of the first tangible progress on the communist nation's disarmament since negotiations began more than three years ago.

The main U.S. envoy said Wednesday the first steps toward dismantling Pyongyang's nuclear weapons could be agreed upon at this round of meetings in Beijing, though he expected "hard bargaining."

Ahead of the six-nation negotiations, the North also signaled it is satisfied with changes in the United States' attitude, following an apparent greater willingness by all sides to compromise. The latest nuclear standoff with the North started in late 2002 after Washington accused Pyongyang of having a secret uranium enrichment program in violation of a 1994 deal between the two countries.

North Korea kicked out nuclear inspectors and restarted its main reactor, moves that culminated in the country's first atomic test detonation in October.

Although the U.S. and key North Korean allies China and Russia backed U.N. sanctions after the nuclear test, Washington has since engaged in a series of diplomatic overtures that have drawn praise from Pyongyang.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill went to Germany last month to meet North Korean nuclear envoy Kim Kye Gwan, and the North later said the sides had reached an unspecified agreement. The specifics of what they discussed have not been made public.

Washington also had separate talks about financial restrictions it has placed on a Macau-based bank where the North held accounts, accusing it of complicity in the regime's alleged counterfeiting and money laundering. Blacklisting that bank has scared off other financial institutions from dealings with the North for fear of losing access to the U.S. market.

Groups combine to preserve history

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three Manhattan groups will discuss their concerns and vision about the current state and future of historic preservation of the city tonight with a historic summit.

The Manhattan/Riley County Preservation Alliance, Downtown Manhattan, Inc. and the City Historical Resources Board will meet at 7 p.m. at the Union Pacific Depot.

The groups will not join together under one governing body, but will inform each other of projects they are undertaking and issues they feel are important.

"It's so we don't duplicate others' efforts and we support the ones we have in common," said Bonnie Lynn-Sherow, summit organizer and associate professor of history at K-State. "The biggest thing is the brain trust."

Some of the groups don't have many members, and this meeting will give those groups an opportunity to get more ideas from others with similar interests, Lynn-Sherow said.

"We generate more and more opportunity for solutions to problems," she said. "Thirty heads are better than eight."

In the past there have been incidences when efforts were almost duplicated, which wastes time and resources.

Although it is not unheard of for someone to be a member of more than one group, not everyone has the time to devote to attending all of the meetings, Lynn-Sherow said.

The summit gives members of all groups a chance to hear from one another, which may lead to plans together down the road.

For instance, if one group is discussing a certain topic at a city commission meeting, then the other groups' members could show up and offer support.

"It would really allow the city commission to realize there is a preservation community," Lynn-Sherow said.

Explosions rock Kansas City industrial area

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Several explosions engulfed a chemical plant in flames Wednesday, forcing a broad evacuation as the fire spewed a sticky substance that residents were warned not to touch.

There were no immediate reports of injuries, but Kansas City police were busy driving up and down nearby streets warning that more explosions were expected at the Chemcentral Corp. facility, which stores and distributes various chemicals and solvents.

Fire Chief Richard Dyer said officials were evacuating people within a one-mile radius, including about 500 residents, and were going door-to-door to get people out.

Fire officials also told residents throughout the city to avoid picking up debris carried by the dark cloud that streamed out of downtown, although Fire Chief Richard Dyer said the material was not highly toxic. The cloud appeared to be dropping a sticky substance as it moved to the southwest over the metropolitan area.

Ken Hannon, a spokesman for the Missouri Department of Natural Resources, said a number of chemicals are at the property, including mineral spirits, turpentine and other solvents.

"I'm looking through the list. I'm not seeing anything that's jumping out at me" as particularly hazardous, he said. "Flammability seems to be the main concern right now for most of these chemicals."

Officials were monitoring the air within a two-mile radius, Dyer said.

Dyer said firefighters had abandoned attempts to fight the blaze and would just let it die out, hopefully by Thursday morning, although it could burn for a few days. A shelter was being set up at a high school for displaced residents.

The Kansas City school district sent students from eight schools in the area to another high school to keep them as far from the explosions as possible, a district spokeswoman said.

The fire began after several 55-gallon drums containing chemicals exploded, touching off more explosions and fires, including blasts from three 30,000-gallon tankers, Fire Marshal Floyd Peoples said.

Plant superintendent Craig Nienhueser said workers heard a hissing noise inside the building. He went around to the back and noticed some flames, at which point the workers were evacuated.

"We are just thankful everybody is OK. Now we just have to work with the fire department to get this contained," Nienhueser said. The plant had operated for about 50 years without a problem.

Dan Brennan, an attorney for Bedford Park, Ill.-based Chemcentral, said it was not immediately clear what caused the explosions at the plant, which has 15 to 20 workers.

breckenridge.com/college

Grading the class of 2007

Notre Dame has Jimmy Clausen, the quarterback with a better pedigree than Barbaro. Southern California has the top two running back prospects in the nation, and Florida has more blue chips than a Vegas casino.

But do any of them have Corey Adams?

More importantly, who the heck is Corey Adams?

Adams just signed with K-State, and in the words of coach Ron Prince, is the "very best long snapper in the country."

The title of Very Best Long Snapper in the Country isn't something to be thrown around lightly. I needed proof, so I checked out a video of Adams in action.

What I saw was poetry in motion. His snaps were rockets, fired with spiraling precision. In his video, Adams snaps at what appears to be a picture of a ketchup bottle, striking the bullseye each time. Then he does it again in slow motion. It's fantastic.

This guy could be an amazing weapon. Being the Very Best Long Snapper in the Country, Adams probably can snap the ball through the goalposts from the 50-yard line and beyond.

Not that you would ever want to do that, but I'm sure he could.

So let those other schools have their can't-miss prospects, their finely groomed football studs.

Me? I'm sticking by my old adage — "Long snapping wins championships."

Now, let's hand out some grades for the rest of K-State's 2007 recruiting class.

OFFENSIVE LINE: B

The theme for this class might be quantity over quality, and that's true for this position. Still, K-State landed three junior college linemen who can step in immediately and help protect Josh Freeman.

RUNNING BACK: C

K-State didn't land a marquee running back, but the good news is the Wildcats return their two leading rushers from last season. Shawnee product Justin Woods is a burner with sub-4.3 speed in the 40-yard dash.

QUARTERBACK: D+

Again, not a huge area of need for K-State. Seems there's some guy named Freeman coming back.

WIDE RECEIVER/TE: B+

Rivals.com analyst Jeremy Crabtree told me Lamark Brown "looks like a Greek god." I hear Zeus had good hands, too.

With the late addition of Danny Hogan, this shapes up to be a good class of receivers.

DEFENSIVE LINE: C-

The late addition of tackles Xzavier Stewart and Michael Abana adds some depth on the interior, but K-State failed to sign an impact defensive end.

LINEBACKERS: B-

Chris Patterson, aka "The Freak," is a speedy outside 'backer that could play right away. However, his junior college coach said he needs some time in the weight room.

SECONDARY: B-

Junior college transfer Gary Chandler is the headliner. Time will tell if he lives up to the hype.

OVERALL: B-

This class is heavy on potential and a little short on immediate contributors. Still, players like Brown, Chandler and Patterson could become household names right away.

And that long snapper is a gem.

Jayhawks' Rush, Arthur combine for 32 points

By Jeffrey Rake

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

LAWRENCE — With 32 wins in the last 33 meetings, No. 9 Kansas already owned the rivalry against K-State.

But after a 97-70 walloping of the Wildcats (17-7, 6-3 Big 12 Conference) Wednesday night at Allen Fieldhouse, the Jayhawks now own a one-game lead over K-State in the Big 12 and sit alone in second place behind Texas A&M with seven games to go in conference play.

Sophomore Brandon Rush and freshman Darrell Arthur combined for 32 points, respectively. Kansas snapped K-State's season-high, seven-game winning streak and avoided consecutive home losses, which hasn't happened since 1989.

"They are better. They are way better," coach Bob Huggins said. "When they are better than you are to start with, and they execute and you don't, it's going to get ugly. We got demolished."

The Jayhawks (20-4, 7-2 Big 12) led 47-35 at halftime, and just in case the Wildcats entertained thoughts of stealing a second-half, come-from-behind win like they did a year ago, sophomore Julian Wright made sure it didn't happen. He made two dunks — the first a nifty two-handed backward jam — in a two-minute span to help Kansas to a 10-point run that extended the lead to 57-35 with 16:29 left.

It got worse from there for the Wildcats, who fell behind by as many as 31 points in the second half.

"We beat ourselves. We didn't do the things that we did in the last six games like we usually do," said senior Jermaine Maybank, who scored a career-high 26 points off the bench for the Wildcats. "We didn't run our offense tonight, and we can't do that against a talented team like Kansas. We don't have a large margin for error ... we didn't do the things we do well."

After playing nearly an entire game against a 2-3 zone last week at Texas, the Wildcats saw nothing but man-to-man this time around. The Jayhawks pressured K-State into 14 turnovers — eight more than K-State had the entire Texas game — and scored 25 points off them.

"I'll give them some credit — they do play some aggressive defense," Maybank said. "But a lot of other teams in the Big 12 play aggressive defense, too. We just took a night off when we weren't supposed to."

Kansas shot 55.9 percent from the field, holding the Wildcats to just 39.1 percent on 18-of-46 shooting. The Jayhawks also dominated inside, outscoring K-State 60-24 in the paint and getting 26 second-chance points.

"When we came out tonight I was concerned about how we would re-

K-State falls to Nebraska in 4th-straight loss

By Wendy Haun

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nebraska senior Kiera Hardy scored 13 points and dished out five assists to lead the Cornhuskers (20-4, 8-2 Big 12 Conference) to a 62-55 victory over K-State Wednesday.

"This was a game in which our basketball team took the floor and competed at a Big 12 caliber tonight," coach Deb Patterson said. "I felt like we did have a more effective response on the offensive end and really struggled at times, as we have in the last few games, in making open shots."

K-State (15-8, 3-7 Big 12) lost its fourth-straight game. Senior Claire Coggins said although her team is on a losing streak, the players still believe in themselves.

"I don't think our confidence is hurt at all," she said. "We're a team that likes to play basketball and get better every day. We know that we're good, and we have faith in each other and in our staff and coaches."

"Teams go through times where they lose, and we're not going to be the type of team that quits. We have six games left, and we see that as a great opportunity."

K-State shot 21-of-62 from the field during the game and 4-of-23 from beyond the arc. Nebraska scored 16 points in the paint in the second half and went 12-of-28 from the field and 2-of-6 from beyond the arc. Overall, the Cornhuskers shot 24-of-55 from the field and 7-of-17 from the 3-point line.

Nebraska senior Chelsea Aubry said winning in Bramlage Coliseum meant a lot to her.

"(K-State is) a great home team," she said. "They love their home court. Their crowd is awesome. There is the rivalry between Nebraska and K-State, but I think it makes it more fun."

Three Wildcats finished in double figures in scoring. Sophomore Shalee Lehning had 15 points, as well as five rebounds and four assists. Junior Kimberly Dietz scored 14 points, and Coggins had 13 points and four rebounds.

For Nebraska, senior Ashley Ford scored 11 points and Aubry and freshman Cory Montgomery finished with eight points apiece. Aubry also brought down a team-high 12 rebounds.

In the first half, there were seven lead changes. K-State led 6-2 in the first two minutes off of points from Lehning and Dietz.

Nebraska regained the lead at the 16:46 mark with a 2-pointer from sophomore Kelsey Griffin to put the Huskers in the lead, 7-6. K-State took the lead again at the 14:16 mark, but once the Huskers took the lead at the 1:51 mark on a Montgomery field goal, they never relinquished it. Nebraska finished the first half on a 7-0 run.

Nebraska coach Connie Yori said K-State challenged her team in the first half.

"I thought it was a game in which two teams really wanted to win," she said. "K-State played with a good degree of urgency, and I thought they took it to us in the first half."

The closest K-State got in the second half was five, when Lehning made a field goal at the 10:06 mark to make it 40-45.

FBC | K-State football team signs 32 players for 2007

Coach Ron Prince said he lost track of time yesterday because of national signing day.

The Wildcats signed 32 players for next season. There were 11 on defense, 17 on offense, two on special teams and two designated as athletes.

Rivals.com ranked K-State No. 40 in recruiting rankings with three four-star players: Lamark Brown, Gary Chandler and Chris Patterson.

Brown, from Hazelwood, Mo., comes in as the No. 71 prospect in the country, according to Rivals. He projects to be a big target at receiver (6-foot-3 215 pounds) for sophomore quarterback Josh Freeman.

Prince said a sleeper from this class might be Xzavier Stewart from Chicago. The two-star defensive tackle choose K-State over offers from Minnesota and Northern Illinois.

BKN | Former NBA player to come out publicly in book

John Amaechi is gay, and now the first NBA player to come out publicly is ready to talk about it.

Amaechi, a center who spent five seasons with four teams, is scheduled to appear on ESPN's "Outside the Lines" Sunday, and his autobiography "Man in the Middle," will be released Feb. 14.

"He is coming out of the closet as a gay man," Amaechi's publicist Howard Bragman said Wednesday.

NBA commissioner David Stern said a player's sexuality is not important.

"We have a very diverse league. The question at the NBA is always 'Have you got game?' That's it, end of inquiry," he said.

Three years after his playing career ended, Amaechi became the sixth professional male athlete from one of the four major American sports (NBA, MLB, NFL, NHL) to publicly discuss his homosexuality.

In his book, Amaechi describes the challenge of being gay in a league where it is assumed that all players are heterosexual. He writes that while playing in Utah, coach Jerry Sloan used anti-gay innuendo to describe him.

Sloan said Wednesday that although his relationship with Amaechi was "shaky" because of the player's attitude, he didn't know Amaechi was gay. Sloan had no comment about Amaechi's contention in the book that Sloan used anti-gay innuendo when referring to him.

Amaechi said he found out about it in e-mails from friends in the Jazz front office.

Jumping through hoops

Path to presidency riddled with obstacles for those who attempt the leap

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The office of President of the United States carries the most power of any single job in the free world. Therefore, candidates and political analysts agree that gaining that power is no easy task.

Step 1: The intangibles

The first requirement involves age and citizenship. To be eligible, a person must be at least 35 years old and have been born in the United States, Guam, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands or born to United States citizens abroad. Also, a candidate must have lived in the United States for 14 years to be eligible. Other factors also have come to be relatively helpful in winning the presidency, one being a law degree. Out of 43 presidents, 25 have had law degrees.

Step 2: Look around

After deciding a presidential bid is a possibility, the next likely step is establishing an exploratory committee. This is a testing-the-waters stage where candidates begin raising money and garnering constituent support. If the vibes are good, a bid could be a real possibility. If people dismiss the idea, there is always Congress.

Step 3: Tell the world

Approximately 22 months before the actual election, candidates might decide the time is right and officially announce their candidacies. Although people have known for months a bid was a possibility, publicly announcing it is a great excuse for a press field day.

Step 4: Iowa

After officially announcing one's candidacy, the next step is to buy a plane ticket to Des Moines, Iowa, the first stop in the blitzkrieg world of the inter-party boxing known as the primaries. The first primaries in the 2008 election are Jan. 19 for the Democrats and Jan. 21 for the Republicans.

Primaries occur in every state between the months of January and June of the election year. Two particular days, Feb. 5 and March 4 of this year, are vitally important and referred to as Black Tuesdays. These days each have several large state primaries from all over the country, and for some candidates it becomes the final reality check that ends a campaign.

Feb. 5, 2008 - Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Missouri, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Utah, West Virginia

March 4, 2008 - Connecticut, Georgia, Maryland, Massachusetts, New York, Rhode Island, Ohio, Texas, Vermont

Step 6: Fighting words

Other than the constant campaigning, debates are the next battles awaiting a potential candidate. Hiring a dedicated team including an opponent imposter has become a necessity in recent years. Usually, there are three large presidential debates before Election Day.

One debate will focus on domestic issues, the second on foreign policy and the third will be a town hall meeting where voters can ask questions. Debates have been the deciding factor in some elections, as when the young, charismatic John F. Kennedy out-spoke pragmatist Richard Nixon in 1960.

Step 5: Time to "party"

If a candidate outlasts his or her party, the reuniting celebration known as the convention is the next step. Selecting a running mate whose name has not been too tarnished or who represents a different constituent base has always been a classic move. The convention speech is the crowning moment of a campaign, one that will be seen by millions and remembered for years to come. A good convention speech can prove to the moderates without party affiliation that a candidate is worthy of office, while a bad, unconvincing speech can be considered the beginning of a landslide for the opposition.

Step 8: Victory and beyond ...

If a candidate can garner 271 electoral votes, he or she will be the new president of the United States. All that is left to do is practice the oath of office, which will take place in January of the following year. Oh, that and prepare to run the free world.

Step 7: Election day

Election Day is the culmination of nearly two years of work for a presidential candidate.

However, winning a majority of votes will not necessarily win the election. In the United States, the winner of the election is the candidate that accumulates the most votes in the Electoral College. This has led to controversy with minority winners in the past, such as current President George W. Bush, who lost the popular election but accumulated more electoral college votes than opponent Al Gore.

Owner of 3 Aggieville businesses shares personal insight

By Kendra Stiles
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Vibrant flower arrangements, cats sauntering around shelves of old books and T-shirts stamped with colorful messages are what Diane Meredith's life is all about.

Meredith, a K-State alum, owns Thread, Acme Gift and the Lawrence and Manhattan locations of The Dusty Bookshelf.

But she doesn't do it alone. Meredith partners with David Sauter, senior in economics, to keep all the stores running.

"If it weren't for David, I really wouldn't have been able to open Acme or Thread," she said. "We're definitely a team in every way."

The pair met in 2001 when Meredith worked at The Dusty Bookshelf. Sauter was helping his mother run the restaurant Marco Polo, and also was a customer at the bookstore. The two would talk business and taxes.

Meredith bought The Dusty Bookshelf from her former bosses when they moved.

"I had been interested in books for a long time, and I just fell into something I love," she said. "They were willing to sell it to me for a small sum, and vintage stuff was just catching on, so I decided to go for it."

Things were working out with the bookstore, and Meredith and Sauter said they decided to try their hand at the flower business.

"Diane was interested in flowers, and we wanted to do something that was different from any typical flower shop, so the idea for Acme came about," Sauter said.

Acme Gift opened in 2003 and moved to Aggieville, across the street from The Dusty Bookshelf, in 2004. Thread, which opened in 2005, was inspired by a friend in the T-shirt business.

"In a college town, T-shirts never get old, so why not try it?" Meredith said.

There is never a dull moment on the corner of Manhattan Avenue and Moro Street, where all three stores are located.

"Each store attracts a certain person or type of personality," Sauter said. "I like to see the crazy things people put on T-shirts."

Meredith added, "It seems like every week there's a twenty-first birthday that needs a shirt."

But maintaining the stores is not an easy feat. Sauter is the "technical guy" and spends most of his time at Thread, while Meredith oversees things at Acme Gift and The Dusty Bookshelf.

"A lot of times, I'll look back on the day and think, 'What did I do today?'" Meredith said. "There's a lot of stuff that other people have done that I've guided them through. Just being present and answering questions is a big part of the job. And we worry about money all day."

Though their jobs are demanding, Meredith and Sauter said they manage to make things fun and relaxed for themselves and their employees.

"Everyone knows everyone, and we have parties," Meredith said. "We try and socialize and have a good time. I love getting to work with the people we get to work with. They're mostly happy, smart, amazing kids."

A pingpong table is even stashed in the upstairs of the bookstore for employees to escape the pressures of work.

"When we go up there to play, we call it 'checking the faxes,' because there was a fax machine up there, too," Meredith said. "Sometimes we get pretty serious."

Court Caywood, senior in secondary education, works for Meredith at The Dusty Bookshelf.

"I could not have a better boss," he said. "To have a boss who cares about her employees like she does is just amazing. I've never worked for anyone where I hoped my boss would show up."

When they do get a day to themselves, Meredith and Sauter said they like riding motorcycles, reading, watching television, playing with their dogs and traveling.

"We're passionate travelers," Meredith said. "We come up with some excuse to go somewhere for one of the stores, and then we make a vacation out of it."

Meredith and Sauter said they don't know what the future holds in store, but one thing is for sure: they dare to dream big.

"We don't know for sure where we'll go next," Meredith said. "Expanding the stores into other college towns would be a big goal. It's mostly a game and a challenge. It has nothing to do with the money. It's a puzzle. Can we do this?"

Sauter added, "When you hear someone say, 'Why isn't there a store like this in Overland Park?' you get carried away with yourself, and then you have a store in Overland Park, because you had to try it."

New campus organization strives to promote health-conscious living

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new club on campus could save lives by changing lifestyles.

The Fruit of the Fight aims to promote healthy living and lifestyles in order to prevent chronic illnesses.

"Currently, the top three killers in the U.S. are heart disease, cancer and stroke," said Kacey Provenzano, sophomore in nutritional sciences and president of FOF. "I believe it needs to be addressed that many of these chronic diseases can be prevented through the promotion of optimal health."

The club meets biweekly with three main goals in mind, the first being to educate others about preventative health care.

"The college campus feels they already know so much, so unless you're a professor, it's hard to teach someone else," said Caitie Palko, sophomore in nutritional sciences and treasurer of FOF. "So we're trying to find interesting and shocking things to teach about how the choices you make in nutrition and exercise do impact you."

Palko said many of the facts FOF comes across are new to her, and she is learning constantly. She said she also is gaining skills from her position as treasurer of the club.

"I can say I had never balanced a checkbook before," she said. "It has given me a lot of financial skills."

After educating members, FOF aims to promote a healthy lifestyle, Provenzano said. The group provides a healthy snack at each club meeting with information about the food, including what it does to the human body and how it is helpful.

"The point of this activity is to introduce healthy eating to some who may not have been exposed to nutritious and delicious food items," Provenzano said.

The group also is considering a trip to Peters Recreation Complex to exercise together.

The third goal of the group is to raise money for organizations dealing with chronic illnesses. The main fundraiser is planned to be a cookbook titled "The Fruit of the Fight," which will contain recipes of healthy, disease-fighting foods.

Provenzano said her mother's death inspired her to begin this program.

"I lost my mother to breast cancer when I was seven," Provenzano said. "That's what made me passionate about the fight of chronic diseases."

When she was a senior in high school, Provenzano was one of 10 finalists for the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Scholarship.

This scholarship recognizes students who have lost a parent to breast cancer. During the interview process, a speaker referred to the finalists as the "fruit of the fight," and this phrase has been special to Provenzano ever since.

"I can't put into words how I felt when I heard that phrase," Provenzano said. "I couldn't think of a better way to describe myself and the nine other young adults in the room whose mothers had fought cancer and lost the battle."

Though the club is fairly new to campus, beginning mid-semester in the fall, Palko said it has been in the works for a long time.

"We talked about it way back during the first semester of our freshman year, Palko said, "and it's finally taking form."

"We have fine-tuned it, and we made it more general. It doesn't just cover breast cancer."

FOF has about 100 members on its e-mailing list, but member Ann Scheufler said she thinks more students can benefit from this club.

"Honestly I think it applies to everyone because everyone is at risk for these diseases," said Scheufler, freshman in dietetics. "If you want to learn more about health, wellness and how to eat healthy, I think it will be an amazing club for you."

Fruit of the Fight will meet at 7 tonight in the lounge at Justin Hall.

Anti-piracy technologies cause rift between Apple, record labels

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — Apple Inc. CEO Steve Jobs challenged influential record labels to strip copying restrictions from music sold online, but their trade group fired back Wednesday, suggesting the company should open up its anti-piracy technology to rivals instead.

Doing so, argued Mitch Bainwol, chairman and chief executive of the Recording Industry Association of America, would eliminate technology hurdles that prevent music fans from buying songs at Apple's iTunes Music Store and playing them on devices other than the iPod.

"We have no doubt that a technology company as sophisticated and smart as Apple could work with the music community to make that happen," Bainwol said in a statement.

In an essay posted on the company's Web site Tuesday, Jobs called on record labels to abandon their requirement for online music to be wrapped in Digital Rights Management, or DRM, technology that prevents unauthorized copying.

The DRM protections prevent the iPod from playing music bought from many other competing online stores.

Jobs said eliminating such restrictions would open up the online music marketplace.

The major record labels — Universal Music Group, EMI Music, Sony BMG Music Entertainment and Warner Music Group — control some 70 percent of the music market and have maintained that DRM safeguards are needed to stave off rampant piracy.

In his letter, Jobs said Apple is against licensing its own DRM technology, known as "FairPlay," as an alternative method for making iTunes accessible to all portable players.

Those same DRM protections also prevent the iPod from playing music bought from many other competing online stores.

Several analysts on Wednesday suggested the record companies follow Jobs' suggestion.

"Clearly, DRM is not working," said Ted Schadler, an analyst at Forrester Research. "It sends a message to the customer that 'we don't trust you.'"

Phil Leigh, senior analyst at Inside Digital Media, said removing copy restraints would give the labels' music more exposure.

"Digital music has entered the mainstream," Leigh said. "The restrictions (the labels) require Apple and others to carry are preventing the market from developing to its full potential — it's retarding the growth."

Still, not everyone agreed dumping DRM is the best strategy for the record labels.

"Eliminating online DRM appears to us to be an overly risky move that eliminates the potential for a future digital-only distribution model free of piracy," Deutsche Bank analyst Doug Mitchelson wrote in a research note Wednesday.

"As easily as Mr. Jobs lectured the music industry on their DRM policies, he could have lectured the software industry (which includes Apple) for its complete unwillingness to pursue an industry-wide DRM standard or make any effort to help music companies in their fight against digital piracy," Mitchelson wrote.

Copy protection is necessary to make other business models, such as the all-you-want music subscription plans offered on services such as Napster, URGE and Rhapsody, or the limited song-sharing features in Microsoft Corp.'s Zune player, said David Card, music and media analyst for Jupiter Research.

Other analysts pointed to the success of eMusic, an online service that sells music in the MP3 format, which is free of anti-piracy restrictions.

The service, owned by Dimensional Associates Inc., offers downloads from a catalog of more than 2 million tracks by independent artists through a subscription plan.

Britain's EMI Music has begun experimenting with releasing music in the DRM-free MP3.

In the last few months, the company has released tracks by Norah Jones, Lily Allen and the band Relient K.

"The results have been really positive. The feedback from fans (has) been very enthusiastic," said EMI spokeswoman Jeanne Meyer.

Whether EMI expands its offerings or other major labels follow suit remains to be seen. Leigh said he believes it will experiment further.

During a bout of rambunctiousness, one snow leopard climbs the fence that surrounds the den. The leopards live in the Asian Forest Trail portion of the zoo.

Zoo raises money for endangered snow leopards

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Long, spotted tails hung over a rocky ledge as Tanja, Kedar and Sherab lazily sprawled out and soaked up the chilly Kansas wind at the Sunset Zoological Park.

Although the typical winters in Kansas keep many people inside and bundled up, the snow leopards at the Jane L. Thiessen Exhibit at Sunset Zoo enjoy the frosty weather, said Karen Randolph, relief keeper at the zoo.

"They love the cold," Randolph said. "We actually make snowmen for them in the winter."

Visitors that trek up the Asian Forest Trail to see the snow leopards would be lucky to find the family playing, because the large cats like relaxing and sleeping, Randolph said.

However, she said the animals are the most active when they are let out of the back dens in the morning and fed.

"Every now and then you go by and they get into little spurts of playing," she said.

The zoo has four snow leopards: a father, Nanda; a mother, Tanja; a female cub, Sherab; and a male cub, Kedar.

Randolph said the father is kept in a separate den because he weighs about 180 pounds, twice the size of the mother, and could hurt the cubs.

But late at night, the adults call out to each other.

She said the snow leopards live in the Himalayan mountainous areas such as Pakistan, China and India. Because the animals are shy and secretive, researchers barely see them.

Randolph said the keepers can't play with the snow leopards, and have to move the animals into a different area when feeding and cleaning their cages.

"We want them to know that they are snow leopards," she said. "And even at the size they're at now, they could be dangerous."

Randolph said the keepers are trained through escape drills to prepare for any emergency situations, and they also make sure to triple check all of the locks of the cages.

The keepers try to give the snow leopards things to play with more than once a week, such as balls or perfume to roll around on, she said.

"It makes life interesting for them," she said.

She said the exhibit has a lot of rocks and logs for the snow leopards to climb because they like to be up high, as well as a full pond in the summer.

The keepers feed the large cats a Nebraska horse-meat feed-line diet that has the nutrients they need.

Once a week they get a shank, which is basically the leg of a horse, Randolph said. They're also given enrichments such as bison or pieces of legs or hoofs.

Randolph said being a relief keeper means she works with different animals almost every day, although she said her interest definitely is in cats.

"They're adorable, and they're so fun to watch," she said. "They're just so playful."

Manhattan resident Earnest McAninch visited the snow leopard exhibit with his sister, who was visiting from Minnesota.

"I was here when they were cubs - I take it they grew up," he joked. "When I saw them last time, they were jumping and playing leap frog."

McAninch also said he remembered the cubs' pelts being a lot whiter than the beige color they are now.

Dianne Paukstelis, marketing and development officer for the zoo, said the cubs were born in May 2006.

The zoo had a contest allowing visitors to help choose the names of the male and female newborns.

Paukstelis said two boys' and two girls' names were selected by the zookeepers; visitors could put coins in the collection box for the name they wanted, and the money was raised for the Snow Leopard Trust.

Paukstelis said the breeding takes place at the zoo and is done after the Association of Zoos and Aquariums gives recommendations.

She said the organization has a list of animals from all of its accredited zoos so the gene pool of the limited number of animals in captivity can stay diverse.

Information at the snow leopard exhibit described how the species is endangered due to poaching and that it can take up to 20 snow leopards to make a fur coat for humans.

According to the Snow Leopard Trust Winter 2006 newsletter, poachers in Afghanistan and Tibet have a lack of economic opportunity, and they hunt snow leopards for their pelts.

Paukstelis said the trust helps the native people find other means for profit instead of poaching.

Peeking through the observation glass, a snow leopard at Sunset Zoological Park looms atop a branch. The zoo has four snow leopards: Nanda, Tanja, Sherab and Kedar. Nanda, the father, stays in a separate den. They are part of one of the zoo's four exhibits of big cats, the others being Siberian tigers, bobcats and cheetahs.

Manhattan Public Library to begin fund-raising events

By Katelynn Hasler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Public Library has a number of events planned in honor of national "Love Your Library" month.

Today, the library is hosting an open house for senior citizens. On Feb. 11, there will be another open house aimed at fundraising. Later in the month, children's story time will be open to all ages.

"These events are an opportunity for us to thank our users," said Fred Atchison, director of the library. "Whether they choose to donate or not, we invite anyone to come out and enjoy everything we have to offer."

Today's open house will highlight the library's services available to older adults, particularly its large-print books, Atchison said. Visitors have an opportunity to meet staff and tour the facility. There also will be several drawings and giveaways.

At 1:30 p.m., a book talk will be given introducing two large-print books new to the library: "Thirteen Moons" by Charles Frazier and "Can't Wait to Get to Heaven" by Fannie Flagg.

"These are two very popular and appealing books," Atchison said. "They'll be presented by very interesting speakers."

The library calls its fund-raising open house on Feb. 11 a "Give a Book" event. It is from 2-5:30 p.m. New books about to be added to the library's collection will be on display for guests to browse. Visitors can make donations to cover the costs of specific books, which will be noted with plates in the books.

"Basically, what people are doing is underwriting and supporting our collection," Atchison said. "The donation can be made as a memorial or a gift. It's a great way to personalize a gift by picking a title or subject that is meaningful to them. It's also a way to give something that will be enjoyed by many, many people."

Claflin Books and Copies and the Emerald City

Market are sponsoring refreshments at the event. The Manhattan Music Machine, a local choral group, will perform at 2:30 p.m.

The library's normal children's story time will be open to everyone from Feb. 20 to 24, not just little ones, Jennifer Adams, children's services manager, said. That week, the books read will focus on a love for books and libraries, she said.

Each day, there will be three different story times in the late morning.

"This is for adults who want to see what we do, parents with older children that don't get to come to story time anymore or kids who have grown out of it," Adams said. "People can revisit an experience they may have had as a child or see something new."

Jill Hill, Manhattan resident, said she and her children enjoy the story time.

"My youngest absolutely loves it; we go weekly," Hill said. "The storyteller is very interactive with the kids and very in tune to their reactions. It's a great program."

CLONING | Products not available any time soon

"If the efficiency of cloning became essentially similar to conventional production, you could envision animals that were superior in certain traits that made their products more desirable, which would be more expensive," he said. "But nobody's envisioning that any time soon."

Fox said products from cloned animals probably will not be labeled since they will not be distinguishable from other products.

This is the case with genetically modified crops.

"That same approach might be used again," Fox said. "But that still leaves the option open for people who are using non-cloned animals to label them as non-cloned. That could very well happen if consumers are sufficiently concerned."

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Chloe, a Hereford cow, pauses during a meal. Chloe is the result of one of about 80 embryos that were produced to attempt genetic cloning. She was the only success.

For now, Chloe and other animals are not destined for grocery store shelves.

However, Davis said when that does happen, he will have no problem with the products.

"I wouldn't hesitate to serve cloned meat or milk, and I wouldn't hesitate to consume it," he said.

The FDA is accepting comments regarding cloned food products for the next 90 days. To make a comment, visit www.fda.gov.

EMBARRASSMENT | Poor play cause of loss

spond to the loss against Texas A&M, and guys responded with toughness," Kansas coach Bill Self said. "In the toughness categories, such as rebounding, we did a good job."

Wright scored nine points and grabbed 11 rebounds for the Jayhawks. Freshman Sheron Collins added 11 points, finishing in double figures for the eighth time in nine games.

Nothing came easy for the Wildcats. They only made 4-of-22 3-point attempts just four days after making 14-of-27 against Texas. Aside from Maybank, no other Wildcat made more than four field goals.

"I didn't expect this at all," Rush said. "I thought it was going to be a come-down-to-the-wire game. They came in and weren't making shots and everything was falling for us, so it turned into a blowout."

Junior David Hoskins scored 13 points, and senior Cartier Martin added 11 for K-State.

"We pretty much beat ourselves," Martin said. "Anytime you take a loss by more than 20 points and you are trying to make the NCAA Tournament, your coach isn't going to be happy."

Whether the loss will effect the Wildcats' postseason chances remains to be seen. However, entering the game, they certainly were well on their way.

In the latest AP Top 25 Poll, the Wildcats received 85 votes. A win over the Jayhawks likely would have allowed them to crack the poll.

The teams play again Feb. 19 at Bramlage Coliseum. Rush said he expects a much more competitive game.

"When we go to their place, it will be a lot tougher," he said.

Serge Afeli, Luis Colon and Lance Harris wait out the final minutes of the Wildcats' 97-70 loss to Kansas at Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence. Catrina Rawson COLLEGIAN

SGA | Students discuss deferred maintenance

"What I learned in my meetings is that we have so inundated legislators with deferred maintenance and statistics that they now know what we are talking about," Maddy, senior in agricultural technology management, said.

Tanner Banion, K-State SGA governmental relations director, said it was important to tell legislators that deferred maintenance is an important issue and keep it on their minds this session.

"When we start hearing about more of the plans, we'll be able to make a better judgment of what's best for the Regents schools," Banion, senior in political science, said.

SGA members at the Regents universities will continue to look at all proposals for deferred maintenance funding, said Ginger Niemann, chairwoman of the Students' Advisory Committee.

The committee is part of the Kansas Board of Regents and consists of a student body president from each Regents university.

"Deferred maintenance is the top priority this legislative session," said Niemann, senior in political science at Pittsburg State University. "We will keep informing our senators and constituents about deferred maintenance and proposals."

"The fact that people are talking about the issue is very encouraging, and it's more than has been done in the past."

Because money should grow on trees.

British officials suspect road rage as motive for letter bomb

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — A parcel bomb exploded and injured three women at Britain's driver and vehicle licensing agency Wednesday, the strongest indication yet that a spate of letter bombs may be motivated by an extreme case of road rage.

It was the third attack in as many days on offices that have some connection to motorists. Six people were injured in those incidents, and police disclosed there had been four additional attacks that injured two people over the past three weeks.

Police said it appeared the bombs were not designed to kill.

"The intention seems to be to cause shock and relatively minor injuries," said Assistant Chief Constable Anton Setchell, the national police coordinator for domestic extremism.

Britain has seen letter bomb campaigns by the Irish Republican Army and animal rights extremists, and vehicle-related vandalism — including explosive attacks on speed cameras — has been reported.

But even Motorists Against Detection, an underground group that claims to have destroyed a thousand cameras designed to catch speeding motorists, said it was appalled by the letter bombs.

"I completely condemn it," said a man who identified himself only as the group's director. "It's like apples and oranges, isn't it? One is a metal object, another is a living entity."

One woman suffered minor burns and two others were treated for injuries to their hearing after Wednesday's explosion at the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Authority in Swansea, Wales.

"I was shaken, shocked and frightened," the burn victim said in a statement given to media. Her name was not disclosed.

The Driver and Vehicle Licensing Authority issues driver's licenses and collects annual road taxes from vehicle owners. It does much of its business by mail.

The Association of Chief Police Officers said seven devices had been mailed in the past three weeks, causing minor injuries to eight people. It did not say whether it believed all the devices were part of a single campaign.

"We have had no contact from any group or organization claiming any responsibility or setting out their reason and motivations," Setchell said. He said police were keeping an open mind about the motive.

Setchell said the devices were contained in padded 6-by-8-inch envelopes that were designed to activate when the contents were removed.

"These packages do not contain conventional explosives," he said, adding that they appeared to be "of a small pyrotechnic nature."

On Monday, a woman was injured by an exploding parcel at the head office of Capita Group PLC in London. One of the company's many government contracts is for designing and running a system for enforcing the $16 daily charge imposed on motorists in central London.

Two people were injured Tuesday in an explosion at Vantis PLC in Wokingham, 40 miles southwest of London. The accounting company reported the package was addressed to a client. Police said the company's clients include Speed Check Services, which provides traffic monitoring technology.

In addition, Thames Valley Police said they were investigating three letter bombs sent last month to companies in Oxfordshire and Birmingham. Each company received a small padded bag containing a crude explosive device. The back of one envelope bore the name of Barry Horne, an animal rights extremist who died in 2001 while serving an 18-year jail sentence for a fire-bombing campaign.

Kent Police said a resident in Folkestone, 70 miles southeast of London, suffered minor injuries Saturday when a letter exploded as it was being opened.

U.S. citizen awarded $16M in terrorist attack in Israel

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — A federal jury awarded $16 million to a Jewish man who claimed that Palestinian groups backed a terrorist attack in Israel in which he was injured, but he could get triple that amount under a law allowing U.S. citizens to sue organizations involved in overseas terrorism.

Moshe Saperstein was attacked in February 2002 by gunmen who sprayed his car with AK-47 rounds, wounding him in the hand, according to court documents.

Saperstein, who has dual U.S. and Israeli citizenship, claimed that the Palestinian Authority and the Palestine Liberation Organization were complicit in the attack.

An Israeli traveling in a separate car died in the attack, as did two Israeli soldiers who responded to the gunfire.

One gunman was killed and two were apprehended, with the attack ultimately blamed on the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade.

The Palestinian groups were accused of organizing, facilitating and sponsoring attacks against Jewish civilians in Israel and parts of the West Bank.

After the Palestinian defendants defaulted by not defending themselves, a federal jury heard evidence this week and returned the $16 million verdict. But under the overseas terrorism law, that amount will likely be tripled to $48 million.

"Justice is served," said Saperstein's wife, Rachel Saperstein. "Now, the fight begins."

The Sapersteins' attorney, Robert Josefsberg, said he will work to identify potential Palestinian assets in the United States, Israel and elsewhere to satisfy the judgment.

Lawyers for the Palestinian groups did contest the lawsuit on procedural grounds — including a claim that the Palestinian Authority and PLO were immune as a sovereign state — but withdrew after losing those rounds.

Alcohol, tobacco, bureau replaces leaders on financial suspicions

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives has replaced two of its leaders, the latest shake-up since reports surfaced of financial and management problems surrounding the agency's former director.

Edgar A. Domenech, the No. 2 official at the Justice Department agency, has been transferred to head the bureau's field division in Washington, D.C., a spokeswoman said.

The assistant director, Michael Bouchard, will leave to oversee field operations nationally.

He has been named special assistant to the bureau's acting director, Michael J. Sullivan.

ATF spokeswoman Sherree Mixell said the two will be replaced with what she described as veteran special agents who "bring a combination of leadership experience and great respect from colleagues that is critical to the ATF's success at the executive level."

Mixell would not comment on whether Domenech and Bouchard were transferred as the result of mismanagement allegations and questionable spending decisions at ATF that targeted former director Carl J. Truscott and led to his departure last August.

An audit by the Justice Department's inspector general in October found that Truscott ordered his staff to help with his nephew's high school homework, wasting the agency's time and violating ethics rules.

The report also concluded that Truscott's leadership, hiring practices and financial decisions were troubling, including his plan to spend $100,000 on gym equipment for the ATF's new headquarters.

Domenech was replaced Wednesday by Ronnie A. Carter, 53, a special agent since 1980 who supervises the Dallas field division.

Bouchard's post was filled by William J. Hoover, who is in charge of the bureau's Washington, D.C., field division.

Navy medic details killing of Iraqi man at sentencing hearing for his Marine friend

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif. — A Navy medic told a military court Wednesday that one of his closest friends — a Marine corporal he regarded as a brother — was instrumental in the kidnapping and killing of an Iraqi man last year.

Prosecutors called Seaman Recruit Nelson J. Bacos as a witness during the first day of a sentencing hearing for Cpl. Trent D. Thomas, who pleaded guilty Jan. 18 to murder, kidnapping and other charges as part of a plea deal. He was one of seven Marines who, along with Bacos, were charged in the April 26 death of Hashim Ibrahim Awad in the Iraqi town of Hamdania.

Thomas is the fifth from the squad to reach a deal but the first to plead guilty to murder.

Bacos, 21, of Franklin, Wis., was the first to make a deal with prosecutors, pleading guilty to reduced charges. A former petty officer 3rd class, he was reduced in rank and sentenced to a year in prison. He was also required to testify against his former squad mates.

On Wednesday, Bacos told the military court how, along with Cpl. Marshall Magincalda, Thomas entered Awad's home while Bacos and Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington waited outside. Thomas and Magincalda returned with a confused-looking Awad, Bacos said, and the troops started walking him away from the house.

For much of that march, Thomas held onto Awad, Bacos said.

"He was grabbing him, pushing him forward," Bacos said. "If he was talking, he told him to shut up, be quiet."

Bacos said the squad forced Awad into a hole and shot him, then tried to cover it up by placing an AK-47 and shovel by his body to make it look like he was an insurgent planting a bomb, as prosecutors and other defendants have stated.

Bacos, testifying about 12 feet from where Thomas sat, did not make eye contact with his friend, whom he met in 2004 and served with on an earlier Iraq combat tour.

When a prosecutor asked Bacos whether it was difficult to testify about Thomas, he said, "It's not easy at all, sir." Bacos indicated that he thought of Thomas as a brother and said they had bonded during a previous tour in Iraq.

Thomas, 25, of Madison, Ill., faces life in prison but will likely receive a shorter sentence because of the plea deal. Attorneys said they plan to call other witnesses in his defense.

The hearing was scheduled to resume Thursday.

IRA at Rock-a-Belly Deli

Bartender Logan Wineland, K-State graduate has been a bartender at Rock-A-Belly Deli for about a year and a half.

He said he loves his job.

"It's the best place in Aggieville," he said. "It's got the most unique atmosphere."

Wineland said there are regulars that come in, and it's nice to know some of the people that frequent. He said working at Rock-A-Belly is fun, and he works with a great staff. Wineland recently graduated from K-State and is headed to medical school, at either the University of Kansas or St. Louis University.

He said the drink, which he called a "big, girl foo-foo" drink, is popular with women.

— Compiled by Eileen Laux

Recipe for an IRA:

- 3 parts vodka
- 3 parts peach Schnapps
- 1 part triple sec
- 1 part grenadine
- Pineapple juice
- Sprite

In a 23 oz. glass pour vodka, peach Schnapps and triple sec. Fill the rest of the glass with pineapple juice and Sprite and top off with grenadine.

Movie advertisements ruin purpose of going to theaters

Audiences go see films to escape and enjoy two hours of storytelling.

However, that experience is beginning to become longer and longer. No, it's not the movies, which are still about two hours, it's the 20 minutes of commercials and previews preceding the film you have waited to see and for which you were willing to fork over $7.

I enjoy the previews myself, but I also enjoy watching trailers on my computer. I am not saying I mind previews, but the commercials are beginning to annoy.

The last movie I saw was supposed to start at 4:50 p.m., and after many commercials, ads and previews, the film didn't start until 5:15 p.m.. It felt more like I was watching television than getting ready to watch a movie.

I remember when I was younger going to the movies watching the trailers and looking forward to what was coming out in the near future.

Now, in the days of digital video recording, advertisers are losing money, because people can just fast-forward through the commercials when they record a particular show.

So where can they advertise for cars, Coca-Cola and movie tickets? In the movie theaters, where no one can fast-forward or leave to check what's in the refrigerator. I understand they have to make money, but do movie audiences have to suffer?

Television and film have become a lot about money, which is understandable, because these projects need funding somehow or they wouldn't exist.

However, film and television are separate entities and should stay that way. They both entertain and tell a story, but the writing, structure and flow of film is different than television.

All I am saying to advertisers is there is no reason to make audiences sit an extra 20 minutes before they begin the film. Soon people will just arrive 20 minutes later than the movie actually is supposed to begin.

The point is movies are supposed to be a time for people to escape from their hectic lives and immerse themselves in a story different from their own.

Not everyone has TiVo or a DVR, and if commercials were shorter, maybe people wouldn't need to fast-forward. One commercial and three or four previews should be sufficient if moviegoers must be subjected to advertisements.

I'll stick to the trailers on the Internet and, for the next few months, plan on going to the theater about 10 to 15 minutes later than the time actually posted.

Brandy sued for $50 million

LOS ANGELES — Anna Nicole Smith and TrimSpa Inc. were sued in a class-action lawsuit alleging their marketing of a weight-loss pill is false or misleading.

Janet Luna and three people identified as her guardians were named in a lawsuit filed Thursday in Los Angeles Superior Court.

They are asking for unspecified damages, restitution and an injunction preventing New Jersey-based TrimSpa, maker of TrimSpa X32, from making claims that users of the pills can lose substantial amounts of weight.

Smith, 39, has endorsed TrimSpa and is a spokesperson.

Last month, the Federal Trade Commission announced TrimSpa would pay $1.5 million to settle allegations that the company's weight-loss claims were unsubstantiated.

TrimSpa released a statement following the announcement saying it supported actions to clean up the weight-loss industry.

TrimSpa also disagreed with any inference that its X32 product has no scientific support.

Marketing club loses $750 in T-shirt fiasco

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A campus organization lost more than $750 in T-shirt sales because of the Feb. 19 ESPN "Big Monday" basketball game against Kansas.

The K-State Marketing Club planned to make black T-shirts for the "Black Out Bramlage" campaign when it was contacted by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and asked to stop making the T-shirts, said Lee Legleiter, president of the club.

The athletic department is supporting the K-State Proud campaign, which is a division of the Changing Lives Campaign to raise money for scholarships, according to the K-State Proud Web site.

The K-State Proud T-shirt, which is black with a Powercat above white letters reading K-State Proud, is the official shirt of the "Big Monday" game.

The club had raised more than $750 when it was told to stop production, Legleiter said.

"We had 100 people sign up for the shirts, and the athletic department said they had formally endorsed the K-State Proud T-shirts," Legleiter said. "Because they did that, nobody could legally compete."

Since the marketing club could no longer use the money it had raised, the club gave the money to the Proud campaign.

Students who bought T-shirts from the club can get the official "Black Out Bramlage" T-shirts from K-State Proud, Legleiter said.

Bob Cavello, associate athletic director, said he thought the club's idea of selling T-shirts for Big Monday was great, but it wasn't executed at the right time.

"They wanted to do a similar promotion," he said. "We asked

None injured in convenience store robbery

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An armed man robbed a local convenience store Wednesday but no one was harmed, said Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department.

Shop Quik, 529 Richards Drive, was robbed at approximately 10:30 p.m. by an unknown black man.

"He was wearing a bandanna across his face," he said.

The man was reported to be approximately 6-feet tall, and was carrying a handgun of some type, Quintanar said.

The man then fled the scene headed west.

The total loss has yet to be determined, according to a press release.

Hot drinks, cozy clothes make chilly weather bearable

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Finding it impossible to stay warm this winter? To combat the cold, many students use two timeless methods for thawing out: sipping hot beverages and bundling up in layers of clothes.

Chelsea Thornton, promotional intern with Zotis Attire, said the easiest way for men and women to stay warm this winter and still stay trendy is to layer clothing.

"If girls don't want to wear a heavy coat when they go out but still want to stay warm, they should layer a long tank-top with a sweater and a short coat," Thornton said.

Puffy vests, textured tights and knee-high boots are all hot items this winter, Thornton said, but Ugg boots might be the most popular. She said they can be worn with tights and a short or long skirt to stay warm and still look cute.

Fort Riley blood drive to replenish shortage

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fort Riley will host a semi-annual post-wide blood drive Tuesday and Wednesday at Riley's Conference Center to help rebuild a blood shortage.

Due to the cold weather, past blood drives were canceled and people haven't wanted to donate, said Dori Farrow, chief administration and operations at the Directorate of Morale, Welfare and Recreation.

Because the recent cold weather created a blood shortage of 1,000 pints, Farrow said the directorate is encouraging everyone — including students — to donate.

"The goal is 120 units of all blood types," Farrow said.

She said the donated blood will stay in the local area.

Deb Skidmore, media relations officer for Fort Riley, said in order for students to get on post they must have a valid driver's license and registration, as well as insurance.

Peter Lewis, vice president of the K-State American Red Cross Club, said he encourages students to support the Fort Riley blood drive.

"Giving blood isn't everyone's cup-of-tea," Lewis, junior in sociology, said. "I would particularly encourage students who are on the fence about making the drive, donating for the first time, or any other issue, to go especially for the first-timer's experience of being on the Fort Riley premises."

There is some camaraderie between Fort Riley and the McConnell Air Force Base in Wichita. The two are having a competition to see which can collect the most pints of blood.

"This blood drive is special because we are defending our title from the previous blood drive," Farrow said.

Conservationist says humans cause climate change

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Al Gore didn't invent global warming. Scientists have issued warnings about our warming planet for decades, a noted conservationist said Thursday night.

"This is not new stuff," said Larry Schweiger, executive director of the National Wildlife Federation, in a lecture at Forum Hall. "What does it take for people to get connected with this issue?"

Speaking as part of the Lou Douglas Lecture series, Schweiger said scientists have known about the dangers of global warming since before 1900.

Still, many Americans remain ignorant about the problem, and Schweiger said the media partly are to blame.

"They're not getting the word out the way they need to," Schweiger said. "They're getting caught up in the frivolous news coverage of our day."

Schweiger addressed a recent report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, a United Nations panel of 2,500 climatologists from more than 130 countries.

The IPCC report linked global warming to human activity and said humans could be to blame for increasingly severe hurricanes.

"The myth you'll hear if you listen to Rush Limbaugh or some of the other crazies is that humans aren't big enough to have an impact on this planet," Schweiger said.

Schweiger said oil giant Exxon Mobil did its best to discredit the IPCC report, including giving money to scientists who will speak out against the findings.

"Exxon Mobil has been funneling money through the Competitive Enterprise Institute," Schweiger said. "I have a document from the Competitive Enterprise Institute offering scientists who are willing to trash the IPCC report $10,000."

However, Schweiger said there is no question that carbon-dioxide levels have risen dramatically since the Industrial Revolution, trapping increasing amounts of energy in the atmosphere.

"We've set levels of carbon dioxide not seen for a million years or longer," Schweiger said.

Schweiger pointed to several consequences of global warming, including forest fires, severe storms and melting polar ice caps.

Friday

Feature film: "Monty Python & the Holy Grail"

8 p.m. Forum Hall*
Admission: $1

King Arthur and his knights embark on a low-budget search for the Grail, encountering many silly obstacles.

Your best bet is to show up early and join in on Monty Python trivia, prizes and free popcorn before the film.

*Movie also shows 7 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. Saturday and 8 p.m. Sunday. Admission is $1.

UPC After Hours: Mission iMPROVable

10-11 p.m. K-State Student Union, Union Station
Admission: Free

Since 1998, Mission iMPROVable, a band of improv agents, has traveled the country spreading its style of improv comedy.

Your best bet is to get there early, because there's a free breakfast bar available for the first 150 people.

"Dark at the Top of the Stairs"

8 p.m. Nichols Theatre
Admission: $8 for K-State students, $11 for military, $13 for the general public

Take in K-State's version of this Pulitzer Prize-winning play by Kansas native William Inge. "Dark at the Top of the Stairs" takes place in Oklahoma in the 1920s. Led by Michael Gros, the comedy-drama comes in the form of short stories, rather than one big story.

Dinner

Before the play, get to Bluestem Bistro for its Friday pizza special. Get a big, thick slice of gourmet Chicago-style pizza and a side salad for $4.75. Paired with a glass of wine or a bottle of premium beer, this dinner deal makes a nice alternative to the typical college pizza experience.

Student Senate passes bill for additional funding

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate members passed a bill Thursday night giving campus organizations additional funding from a reserve account.

A one-time $20,000 increase for campus organizations will increase the Allocations Committee's fund from about $29,000 to $49,000, according to the bill. The funding comes from the Reserve for Contingencies Account, which the Office of Student Activities and Services accountant manages.

Senators passed the bill with a vote of 50-0 after it was moved to special orders. Melissa Hildebrand, University Relations Committee chair, moved special orders for the bill because there was $5,900 in the Allocations Committee account, said Nick Piper, Allocations Committee chair.

At Sunday's committee meeting, there will be $7,400 worth of requests from campus organizations, Piper, senior in finance, said.

The starting budget for the Allocations Committee is $29,000.

There are five weeks of allocations left to consider this fiscal year, and the committee must receive request proposals at least 28 days prior to the campus organization's event.

An additional campus organization funding from reserves also took place during the Senate's last term in 2005-06, Piper said.

A hand vote from Senators took place in order to pass special orders. Ashley Boldt, Student Senate chair, said enough debate occurred during special orders introduction to require a two-thirds hand vote from senators.

"I usually use voice vote on special orders to decide if there should be a hand vote," said Boldt, senior in family studies and human services.

While he voted for the bill, Tim Weninger, College of Engineering senator, spoke against the bill receiving special orders.

"It deserves more of a review than 15 minutes," Weninger, senior in information systems, said. "I urge you to wait a week on this bill."

Anthony Carter, College of Education senator, spoke during positive debate for special orders.

"This group of individuals are coming (to Allocations Committee Sunday) to get a fair decision based on the quality of their event, not on the lack of funds that we have in our account," Carter, junior in secondary education, said. "It's very important that we pass this speedily."

Proud Campaign plans events to precede 'Black Out Bramlage'

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students still have a chance to contribute to the K-State Proud campaign before the "Black Out Bramlage" event Feb. 19 by participating in different activities next week in the K-State Student Union.

Joe Vossen, junior in political science, is a co-chair for K-State Proud and said the events will begin with Dollar Day on Monday, where students can pay $1 to enter drawings for prizes at the Union Courtyard from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

Feb. 16 is Purple Pride

Day, where individuals that have contributed to the campaign and are wear their K-State Proud T-shirts can get a free scoop of Purple Pride ice cream during the lunch hour at the Union, Vossen said.

The events will lead up to the campaign celebration and pep rally Feb. 19, prior to the K-State men's basketball game against Kansas, he said.

Vossen said Bramlage Coliseum will open early for students wearing the campaign T-shirts, and a pep rally will begin at 6:15 p.m. in which coach Bob Huggins will address the students. Those students that contributed to the campaign but do not have game tickets can attend a watch party in the Union.

"If you don't have tickets to the game, that will be the next-best thing," Vossen said.

Students can stop by a booth set up for the campaign to donate on Feb. 12 in the Union courtyard and the first floor of the Union from Feb. 13 to 16.

If students donate a minimum of $10 they will receive the official K-State Proud T-shirt, Vossen said.

"We really encourage any student to stop by," he said. "We'd be happy having them show their support any way they can."

Taylor Symons, sophomore in speech communications, is co-chair of the events planning committee for the campaign and said next week's events will build excitement before the Feb. 19 game.

"Starting on Monday, we wanted to have something that could really get the ball rolling and create excitement," he said.

For the basketball game, the committee wanted to have students show their pride and have the entire student section blacked out with the K-State Proud campaign T-shirts, which feature a white Powercat, he said.

Symons said the K-State

Proud campaign is under the umbrella of the Changing Lives Campaign, in which the money donated goes specifically to a student opportunity fund that is given to students as an award, not as a scholarship, loan or grant.

"We want students to realize that giving back to the university is such a great thing to do, especially when it's benefiting your friends, peers and even yourself in the long run," he said.

Vossen said the award could be for someone that needs financial help, or for someone who has dedicated a lot of time to an organization.

Jenna Kennedy, junior in microbiology and co-chair for the campaign, said the event is a way for students to enjoy participating in philanthropies.

"The whole campaign is to educate students about the importance of philanthropy and giving back to the community," she said. "We're going to count our success by the number of students that we can inform."

She said the students who contribute to the campaign will have their photos taken and posted.

"It's kind of a way to represent how enthusiastic the response has been," she said.

Happy Deathday

Miami residents prepare to cheer Castro's demise

When I die, I hope people will feel at least some degree of sadness. I'm not asking for them to need months away from work to mourn or for Kleenex sales to skyrocket, but I know what I don't want.

MEGAN MOLITOR

I don't want people donning party hats and cheering drunkenly into the night, which is exactly what some will be doing when Cuban ruler Fidel Castro dies.

The city of Miami is planning quite the going away party for Castro, their not-so-dear neighbor, once he goes to meet his maker.

According to an article on FoxNews.com, the Miami city commission appointed a committee whose official job is to "discuss an event at the Orange Bowl in case expected events occur in Cuba."

In other words, Miami citizens need to dust off those annoying party favors that unfold and make noise when you blow into them. It could be time for a fiesta of grande proportions.

The details are still fuzzy, but the committee planning a celebration that could include many entertainers and musicians and could last for hours, even days.

This committee has been planning the aforementioned party for quite some time now, but it has picked up the pace a bit now Castro is a lot closer to the dirt than last summer.

I think this party is the best idea since canned spaghetti. I doubt it doesn't make Castro feel like putting on his dancing shoes, but I suppose when you're one of the most hated men in the world, death parties are just part of the territory. Sure, maybe it's a little sadistic. A party for someone usually includes, well, them. I don't imagine that would be the case here — at least I hope not.

Imagine the turnout at an event like this. It would be an amazing opportunity for Cuban-Americans everywhere to release a lot of pent-up hatred toward the Cuban leader and a chance to begin looking forward into the future.

Change has to start somewhere, and an event of this magnitude would be the perfect outlet to begin the celebration of a new era in Cuba.

The event is aimed to take place at the Orange Bowl, but according to Fox News, many Cuban immigrants would love to see it in Little Havana, the ethnic enclave that is home to many Cuban immigrants. What could be a more perfect setting?

Illustration by Elvis Achelpohl | COLLEGIAN

I doubt the death party idea is bound to become an American tradition, but I do think this situation definitely warrants such an off-the-wall party.

Castro has done nothing but torment and torture his citizens for 50 years. After enduring that kind of treatment, I'd be ready for a release, surrounded by people who had gone through it with me.

So Miami, look out. You haven't got reason to live it up just yet — the aging dictator still is hanging on.

And when it happens, I am going to dig out my party hat, too.

No simple solutions for Iraq

Iraq has become Washington's hot potato — bobbling about scorching hands and burning off eyebrows. Everyone knows it's about to blow, and the politicians, especially the elephant party, are bumping it down the line toward el Presidente, hoping to avoid the blast.

JONAS HOGG

Trying to come up with a workable plan is the most surefire way to get yourself voted off the island — nobody wants to hear that crap. The debate, as currently framed, orbits around two extremes, each entirely oblivious to reality.

Karl Rove's armchair über-patriots, determined not to wind up in the same dunce-caps as their pappies did after botching Vietnam, are in the fight until either victory or carpet bombings reaffirm the might and virility of the U.S. military machine.

For these super-pundits, aircraft carriers might as well be giant, floating, jock-strap stuffers. Everything is viewed with a snarling simplicity of good and bad — we aren't fighting Shiites, or Sunnis, or Baathists or Iraqi nationalists — our enemy in Iraq is "them jihadi-terrorists." The solution is more bombs and more troops — failing that, "Turn it into a flat sheet of glass."

Meanwhile, bored, lefty Gen-Xers without two brain cells to rub together hoot and holler about cutting off funding and immediate withdrawal. Absent any meaningful experience other than protesting Starbucks genetically modifying its latté, this war has evolved into their cause extraordinaire.

This is the dream generation, the Alliances for Peace and Justice around the world — the people who deep-down believe that if only they had the chance to talk to people, then we'd all join hands for a worldwide lovefest. Aside from aspirations to be miniature Ghandis, they are more than happy to drive their SUVs and bash people over the head who interrupt their rallies.

Everyone, save these dewy-eyed flower-children knows the big dog in Washington would sooner ram his tongue down Dick Cheney's throat on national television than cut this war short. Cut off funding? If you think the armed forces ain't been socking money away in case of a surly Congress, I advise you to have your head checked.

In the middle sit the armed forces. The royal screwing they are about to get is no longer a matter of "if" — the million-dollar question is, "by whom?"

Being run by doddering generals aching to get their name carved into a battleship somewhere, the military also remains obnoxiously clueless on how to fight modern wars. American forces in Iraq are simply a newer, shinier version of the 1940s U.S. military. Replace Berlin with Baghdad, Fallujah or Sadr City, and even the news conferences sound the same.

When our good guys swarm en masse through an area and "clean it out," there is a healthy round of back-patting and congratulations. Then as soon as the G.I. Joes pack up and go somewhere else, the butchers and merchants and tailors and common schmucks pick up their weapons and go right back to work. This is a privilege you can afford when the battleground is also your neighborhood.

There aren't easy answers here — the sooner we figure that out the better. Having made big promises they either won't or can't keep, I think our newfangled Democrats are going to have some questions to answer in the coming months.

In fact, it seems politicians on both sides are beginning to wonder if they aren't about to be rounded up and drug off to gallows, which would be the only good thing to come of the whole affair.

TO THE POINT

An editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

K-State Proud should disclose specific uses of funds to gain legitimacy

We're proud — proud to be at K-State and proud to bleed purple.

But we're also skeptical. K-State Proud has been described as a one-of-a-kind fundraising campaign where students donate money that will go to help other students.

According to www.found.ksu.edu, students donate a minimum of $10 to receive a K-State Proud T-shirt.

That money goes to student opportunity awards as part of the Changing Lives Campaign.

Now, as fellow students who realize college life can have its share of financial woes, we're all about helping each other out.

We want to be true to our school, and we want to help those with financial burdens become Wildcats too.

We do not discount the motivations and intentions of the campaign, but what happened to the tuition money we've poured into the school?

Not to mention the looming loans, heavy-weight books and monthly rent, gas, grocery and utility bills plaguing the average college student.

Don't we already fork over a handful of Benjamins to this school every semester?

But let's look at this from a different perspective.

Many students are willing to spare a week's worth of coffee for a good cause.

But, in this case, it can be difficult to determine who exactly is benefiting from our additional contributions.

We have heard the student opportunity awards from K-State Proud go to a wide spectrum of candidates, from students struggling to make ends meet to those strongly involved in student organizations.

We just want to know who decides who those students are.

People like to know where their money goes and why it goes there. When giving money cheritabily we like to know our donations are going to the correct places.

We are no different, and as a program committed to the betterment of K-State students we think everyone would benefit from greater openness in this process.

Most legitimate charitable or nonprofit organizations publish lists of expenditures for anyone who contributes. United Way, Feed the Children and Unicef all are well-known for keeping their financial open to the public, according to Charity Navigator, a watchdog organization.

Even Telefund, to which many K-State students devote their volunteer hours says specifically that the money goes to scholarships for students. What does the Proud Campaign "award" money go toward, exactly? The answer we've heard is oddly vague.

Being committed to keeping K-Staters informed, we would be happy to run an expense report in the Collegian so readers will know exactly where their bucks are going.

But until we know just what exactly we are supporting, it's hard to offer our full support.

If our cash flow is going to be pocketed by a full-ride scholarship winner wanting to sign up for TiVo, we might refrain.

WORLD NEWS

CHINA ACKNOWLEDGES RISKS IN QUEST FOR AFRICAN ENERGY, MINERALS

PRETORIA, South Africa — Chinese President Hu Jintao is in Africa bearing usual gifts of money for soccer stadiums and interest-free loans. But he also has brought a new recognition of the downside of China's aggressive quest for the continent's resources.

These include tensions over mounting trade imbalances, the practices of some Chinese investors and the risks of doing business with rogue states.

Unmentioned is the possibility of a dispute with the United States as the two vie for resources and influence on the continent. Another source of possible conflict is China's arms sales to countries accused of human rights violations.

Hu had to deal with pressure to influence Sudan's government about the bloody conflict in Darfur. And in Liberia, there were rumors that a legislator received a handout from Taiwan, China's rival.

Clothing manufacturers in Zambia complained cheap Chinese goods are destroying their business. South Africa's textile union says some 100,000 jobs have been lost as synthetic fabrics replace cotton prints in street markets across the continent, and last year threatened to boycott Chinese products.

Fearing protests, Hu canceled a visit to Zambia's Copperbelt, where Beijing is setting up an economic cooperation zone expected to draw $800 million in mining investments.

While many Zambians welcome the Chinese presence, there has been a backlash fueled by workplace accidents, poor working conditions and low pay at Chinese-run copper mines. Fifty-one Zambian workers died in a 2005 mine explosion and dozens of protesters were fired on by Chinese security guards last year.

VENEZUELA MOVES TO NATIONALIZE ELECTRIC COMPANY THROUGH AES

CARACAS, Venezuela — President Hugo Chavez's government moved to nationalize Venezuela's largest private electric company on Thursday, signing an agreement to buy a controlling stake in Electricidad de Caracas from its U.S.-based owner, AES Corp.

Paul Hanrahan, president and chief executive of Arlington, Va.-based AES, signed the sale agreement during a ceremony at the presidential palace in Caracas, agreeing to pass the company's 82-percent stake in the utility to the Venezuelan government within three months.

Venezuela will pay some $739.3 million for AES' share in Electricidad de Caracas, said Rafael Ramirez, president of state oil company Petroleos de Venezuela SA. He said the company is valued at $900 million as a whole.

"We are preserving the interest of the minority shareholders," said Ramirez, who signed along with Vice President Jorge Rodriguez on behalf of the government.

The deal marks the first of multiple nationalization moves planned by Chavez since he was re-elected in December.

CANADA CONFIRMS 9TH CASE OF MAD COW

OTTAWA — The United States said Thursday it would dispatch a specialist to help investigate Canada's latest case of mad cow, but that Washington did not expect the new finding to hurt trade between the two countries.

On Wednesday, Canada confirmed its ninth case of mad cow disease since 2003, in an Alberta bull that died on a farm last week. The Canadian Food Inspection Agency said that a mature bull tested positive for mad cow, or bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Dr. George Luterbach, the agency's senior veterinarian for Western Canada, said the animal's death caused the farm to identify it as an "animal of interest" as part of a national surveillance program.

Eating meat products contaminated with BSE has been linked to more than 150 human deaths, mostly in Britain, from variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease, a rare nerve disease.

No human deaths as a result of mad cow have been reported in Canada.

Eight previous cases of BSE have been detected in Canadian cattle since May 2003, when the discovery of an Alberta cow with the disease caused the United States to slam the border shut to cattle exports entirely.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture will dispatch a USDA expert to Canada to help with the investigation, said Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns.

LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT

Students visit Capitol, talk with legislators

As the Kansas legislative session continues to heat up, I find myself driving east to Topeka more and more on behalf of K-State.

On Wednesday, as part of Higher Education Day, a dedicated contingent of K-State students gathered at the State Capitol. Armed with packets of information and K-State charm, we visited as many legislators as possible to urge them to continue the push for an increase in deferred maintenance funding.

LUCAS MADDY

Some K-State students encountered resistance, but overall the group accomplished a lot. I was most satisfied with the fact that all of the conversations between legislators navigating the halls were focused on deferred maintenance.

The topic is fresh in our politicians' minds, and now is the time to believe our legislative process.

I have faith that soon students at Regents universities will no longer be subjected to learning in sub-standard, unsafe environments.

You should, too.

Back on campus, the Chinese Students and Scholars Association is having a celebration of another kind — the Chinese New Year.

These students should be commended for their excitement and hard work in organizing a great week of events. Please join them at their Spring Festival this Saturday in McCain Auditorium; it will be an event to remember.

Thanks to you all for a very successful start to the semester. Go Cats!

Bush continues to push ethanol, other fuels as way to reduce foreign oil dependence

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Determining how best to speed ethanol and other alternative fuels from refinery to gas pump would rest with the government under legislation the House passed Thursday.

President Bush is promoting such fuels as a way to reduce dependence on foreign oil and cut air pollution. But their widespread use has been hampered by problems with the current system of transporting and storing the fuels.

Ethanol and some biodiesel blends, for example, can corrode tank and pipeline materials, build up sediment, clog filters and cause emissions volatility.

In addition, it costs tens of thousands of dollars for the nation's 160,000 gas stations to refit pumps to dispense biofuels.

The bill, which passed by a 400-3 vote, directs the Environmental Protection Agency to study new technologies that would eliminate some of these infrastructure problems.

The bill by House Science Committee chairman Bart Gordon, D-Tenn., also directs the government to develop an affordable and quick way to test the sulfur content of ultra low sulfur diesel fuel.

At issue is whether such low sulfur diesel may absorb enough residual sulfur as it moves from the refinery through pipelines and trucks to exceed EPA limits.

"This bill not only addresses our energy independence issues but it also addresses clean energy issues by working to mitigate potential problems that can arise from transporting clean fuels," said Ralph Hall, R-Texas, the committee's top Republican.

The measure now goes to the Senate for consideration.

Bush said in his State of the Union address last month that alternative fuels are essential to his goal of cutting U.S. gasoline usage by 20 percent in the next 10 years.

He said there should be a requirement of 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels in 2017, nearly five times the current target.

The House spent nearly two hours on an amendment supporting the use of domestically produced alternative fuels on aircraft.

The measure, which passed 385-23, gave Republicans a platform to complain about the expense of the Pentagon's supplying Speaker Nancy Pelosi with a jet large enough to travel nonstop to her home in California.

House Republicans also demanded second votes on four amendments to protest a new Democratic-generated rule that allows the delegates from the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and three territories to vote on amendments, but not on final passage of legislation.

"We're creating the record in case there is a lawsuit" regarding the constitutionality of the new rule, said Rep. Lee Terry, R-Neb.

Defense Department investigation concludes some Pentagon intelligence work was inappropriate but legal

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Some of the Pentagon's prewar intelligence work, including a contention that the CIA underplayed the likelihood of al Qaeda connections to Saddam Hussein, was inappropriate but not illegal, a Defense Department investigation has concluded.

In a report to be presented to Congress today, the department's inspector general said former Pentagon policy chief Douglas J. Feith had not engaged in illegal activities through the creation of special offices to review intelligence.

Some Democrats also have contended that Feith misled Congress about the basis of the administration's assertions on the threat posed by Iraq, but the Pentagon investigation did not support that.

Two people familiar with the findings discussed the main points and some details Thursday on condition they not be identified.

The Senate Armed Services

Committee has scheduled a hearing Friday to receive the findings by Thomas F. Gimble, the Pentagon's acting inspector general. The committee's chairman, Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., has been a leading critic of Feith's role in prewar intelligence activities and has accused him of deceiving Congress.

Levin has asserted that President Bush took the country to war in Iraq based in part on intelligence assessments — some shaped by Feith's office — that were off-base and did not fully reflect the views of the intelligence community.

In a telephone interview Thursday, Levin said the IG report is "very damning" and shows a Pentagon policy shop trying to shape intelligence to prove a link between al Qaeda and Saddam.

"That was the argument that was used to make the sale to the American people about the need to go to war," Levin said. "And the idea that this separate intelligence assessment, which was wrong, which was distorted, which was inappropriate for the reasons given here (by the IG) is something which is highly disturbing."

Levin also said it was a "red herring" to say that he or others in Congress claimed that any of Feith's activities had been illegal. Feith has said the accusation that he misled Congress was, by definition, a claim that he had acted illegally.

Levin in September 2005 asked the inspector general to determine whether Feith's offices' activities were appropriate.

If deemed inappropriate, the inspector general should recommend remedial action, Levin said then. Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., who was chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee at the time, asked the inspector general to decide on legality as well as appropriateness.

The 2004 report from the Sept. 11 Commission found no evidence of a collaborative relationship between Saddam and Osama bin Laden's al Qaeda terror organization before the U.S. invasion.

Rankings do not predict recruits' collegiate success

College football fanatics experienced an early Christmas on Wednesday: National Signing Day.

The day is full of surprises. Fans log onto message boards, and wait for their favorite recruits to sign with their team.

Rival fans yell at each other, saying, "My recruiting class is better than yours."

Does it really matter though?

What makes a recruiting class good is if the players fit the system, not the ranking that comes with each 17- or 18-year-old high school student.

Last year at this time, coach Ron Prince signed his first class, which had 31 players. The headliners of the group were quarterback Josh Freeman and running back James Johnson. Both were four-star recruits, according to Rivals.com, and contributors to a team that went to a bowl game for the first time in three years.

They were the highlights, but then there were players like cornerback Josh Moore and tight end Jeron Mastrud. Moore and Mastrud, both two-star recruits, started several games for the Wildcats as true freshmen.

I guess the recruiting gurus missed them.

When K-State fans think of Moore, they see a diving break-up pass during an important game this past year.

Mastrud had a leaping reception in the same game that should have been called a touchdown but was marked down at the one.

That game was against Texas, which has had four top-15 recruiting classes since 2002, according to Rivals. The Wildcats only had one top-15 class in that time period and two top-25 classes.

Boise State provides more proof that recruiting rankings don't matter: From 2002 to 2006, the Broncos' recruiting classes averaged a No. 98 rating from Rivals.

They proved to be much better than their rankings, defeating then-No. 11 Oklahoma, 43-42, at the 2007 Fiesta Bowl.

Boise State recruited athletes and coached them to be a team.

K-State's recruiting this year had a new feel to it. K-State loaded up early on regional commitments and expanded from there.

In the process K-State grabbed three four-star commitments and some not as highly regarded, but versatility was one of things Prince wanted.

"Versatility was very important in this class," Prince said. "We're still developing players and for many of these players Mother Nature is going to tell us, in the next 18 months, what they are."

Prince wanted speed, and he got it. Thirteen of his recruits ran the 40-yard dash in 4.5 seconds or faster. Florida, which recruited the top class this year, has just eight players who can do that.

Prince wanted offensive linemen, and signed eight. Three of the linemen were junior college transfers.

"They are exactly in the model that we want. Athletic guys who are tall, long arms and who can run," Prince said.

The Wildcats needed wide receivers. They signed six players that are expected to play the position.

The Wildcats ended signing day ranked 40th in the nation and eighth in the Big 12 Conference, but it doesn't matter. They filled needs.

No one knows what a recruit can do until he gets on the field at their university, and once he gets there it doesn't matter how many stars he has. It matters how many plays he makes.

Wildcats look to bounce back after loss to Jayhawks

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After going on a seven-game winning streak by playing tough, pressure defense, K-State let it all slip away during Wednesday night's 97-70 loss to No. 9 Kansas.

During the winning streak, K-State (17-7, 6-3 Big 12 Conference) held opponents to an average of about 60 points per game.

In addition to giving up a season high in points, the Wildcats allowed the Jayhawks to shoot 55.9 percent. Five different Kansas players scored in double figures.

"We just didn't come out to play," junior Clint Stewart said. "They came out with all the energy. We've got to come out every game. Guys basically laid down, and you just can't let that happen."

Luckily for the Wildcats, they play the Big 12's worst team, Colorado (6-13, 2-7) tomorrow. The Buffaloes have lost four of their last five games.

"Their record shows that they're not a very good team, but they've got some good players," Stewart said. "(Richard) Roby is a go-to guy, and so defensively, we've got to get after them and play with some intensity. We've got to shut them down early and get up in them."

Roby, a junior, leads Colorado in points, averaging more than 17 per game. He has scored 20 or more in nine games this season.

Roby led the Buffaloes to a shocking 89-77 win over Oklahoma State Saturday. The 6-foot-6 guard scored 20 and grabbed nine rebounds.

K-State and Colorado split last year's games, with each team winning at home. The Buffaloes won 79-75 in Boulder, Colo., Jan. 28 before the Wildcats repaid the favor with a 72-60 victory in Manhattan Feb. 18.

"We've got to bring that energy and intensity that we didn't have in the KU game and get back on track defensively," junior David Hoskins said. "We didn't pay a lot of attention to detail, and we didn't guard the way we're capable of."

Senior Jermaine Maybank was the lone bright spot in the KU game. After entering the night averaging about two points per game, he scored a season-high 26 against the Jayhawks.

"(Maybank) had a great game," Hoskins said. "So you can definitely expect to see him a lot more."

Hoskins and senior Lance Harris, both starters, played a combined seven minutes of the second half against Kansas.

Other than Maybank, no player made more than four shots. Despite his 7-of-10 shooting performance, the Wildcats shot less than 40 percent from the field.

"(Coach Bob Huggins) knows we've got to get better," Stewart said. "What happened against KU, there's no excuse for it. We've just got to get better, and we've got to work at it every day."

Women face Texas Tech Sunday, look to end 4-game losing slump

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After dropping its fourth straight game, the women's basketball team has a few days to regroup before traveling to Lubbock, Texas, to face Texas Tech on Sunday.

The Wildcats (15-8, 3-7 Big 12 Conference) fell to Nebraska 62-55 Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum. K-State again struggled from the field, shooting 33.9 percent, and finished just 4-of-23 from 3-point range.

The loss came on the wake of K-State's worst shooting performance of the season, a devastating 61-34 loss to Texas in which the Wildcats connected on just 7-of-24 field goals and failed to sink a 3-point shot for the first time since 2003.

K-State has experienced significant problems on offense since sophomore Marlies Gipson injured her knee and missed the first game of her career on Jan. 17. At the time of her injury, Gipson was the team's leading rebounder and second-leading scorer.

The Lady Raiders (14-10, 5-5) also had a difficult time Wednesday, dropping their second-straight game to No. 15 Baylor 80-67.

Senior Patrice Edwards led the way for the Lady Raiders with a career-high 33 points. Texas Tech was able to bring the score as close as 64-63 with 5:14 remaining in the second half, but the Bears responded with a 9-0 run to clinch the victory.

Texas Tech struggled early in Big 12 play, losing to Baylor, No. 16 Texas A&M and No. 12 Oklahoma. The Lady Raiders recovered with wins over Oklahoma State, Missouri, Kansas and a big 49-48 victory over Texas Jan. 27.

Senior Alesha Robertson is the leading scorer and rebounder for the Lady Raiders this season, averaging 13.8 points and 8.9 boards per game.

Texas Tech sits at seventh place in the Big 12 standings, while K-State has fallen to ninth.

The last time the teams faced one another, the Wildcats nabbed a 53-51 victory at Bramlage on Jan. 4, 2006. Senior Claire Coggins and junior Kimberly Dietz led K-State in scoring along with former Wildcat Twigg McIntyre with 10 points apiece.

Although the Lady Raiders lead the all-time series 8-6, the Wildcats have fared better recently, topping Texas Tech in their three previous meetings — however, K-State is 2-4 at United Spirit Arena.

After Sunday's game, K-State will return to face Colorado at 7 p.m. Wednesday, Feb. 14, at Bramlage.

RUN | Wagner, track team back in action for ISU Classic

After a week off from competition, senior Kaylene Wagner is back to work.

Wagner

"We have harder workouts on Saturday," said Wagner about having last weekend off. Wagner enters the Iowa State Classic, Feb. 9-10 at the Lied Recreation Center, on a five-event win streak in the high jump.

"I kind of made an agreement with myself not to worry about winning," Wagner said. She said she is worried about consistency.

That's hard to believe considering she has two jumps at the 6-1/2 mark and one at the 6-3/4 mark. The highest mark was at the Dan DeHart Invitational Jan. 26-27.

The other high-jump superstar is sophomore Scott Sellers. He tied the school record this year with a jump of 7-5 1/4. At every meet this season, he jumped high enough to provisionally qualify for the NCAA Indoor Championships.

"I would like my first jump to be at the automatic qualifying height," Sellers said.

Junior Morgan Bonds and sophomore Tevan Everett also are trying to extend their win streaks this weekend. Both won the 600-yard run last weekend at the Sevigne Husker Invitational.

Bonds will compete in the 800-meter run and has won three of those titles this year, with her best time coming at the Arkansas Invitational with a mark of 2:07.87. She won every race she competed in during this indoor track season.

Everett beat out his twin brother, sophomore Tevas Everett, last weekend with a time of 1:09.32.

The Wildcat women are ranked No. 11 in the nation, according to Trackwire. That puts them third in the Big 12 Conference behind Texas Tech and Texas A&M.

FBC | Football team adds Brock as wide receivers coach

Dave Brock, a 17-year veteran of the coaching profession, has been named wide receiver coach at K-State, football coach Ron Prince announced Thursday.

Brock comes to K-State from North Carolina and will replace Pat Washington, who accepted a position on the coaching staff at Mississippi State in January.

A native of Moorestown, N.J., Brock's 17-year coaching career includes stops at North Carolina, Temple, Hofstra, Salisbury State and Western Connecticut State.

Brock most recently completed his second season at North Carolina, where he served as the Tar Heels' assistant head coach/recruiting coordinator and wide receivers coach. While at UNC, he tutored two of the top wide receivers in Carolina history in Jarwarski Pollock and Jesse Holley. In 2005, Pollock became the all-time leading receiver at Carolina with 177 career catches, and Holley led the team with 47 receptions.

In 2006, Brock coached wide receiver Hakeem Nicks to honorable mention freshman All-America honors by The Sporting News as Nicks set UNC freshman records with 39 receptions for 660 yards and four touchdowns.

WGF | Sunner takes 2nd place in Baja Classic

K-State freshman Abbi Sunner shot a 76-74 — 150 (+6) at the Baja Classic in Ensenada, Mexico, taking second place overall and leading the Wildcats to an 11th place finish.

Sunner

The Wildcats fired opening day rounds of 326 and 316, but due to inclement weather canceling the final round, they did not have an opportunity to improve their total.

As a result, Oregon won the tournament with a team score of 609 (+33).

After only five days of practice, the Wildcats tried to shake off the rust from a long offseason. However, they did not get enough consistency throughout the lineup.

Only one other player, junior Michelle Regan, posted a score in the 70s, shooting a 77-77 — 154 (+10).

"The team knows that we are better than the 326 we shot in the first round," coach Kristi Knight said. "The good news is they got to be (outside) and they got to play, even though it was not a good result for us as a team."

But it was a great day individually for Sunner, who finished in the top 10 for the second time in the last three tournaments dating back to last fall.

"I was very proud of Abbi. She played really solid and has earned a spot in the lineup," Knight said. "If I was going to find a bright spot in all of this, it was the play of Abbi."

The Wildcats play next at the Fresno State Invitational, in Fresno, Calif. Feb. 26.

"We have two weeks to get ready for Fresno State, and hopefully we can get outside to practice," Knight said.

New Year Festival features Tai Chi performance

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State instructors and Manhattan residents performed a Tai Chi demonstration Thursday in the K-State Student Union as part of the Chinese New Year celebration.

Xiuzhi Susan Sun, associate professor in grain science and industry, said the show involved 24 steps set to music.

She said she began studying Tai Chi in 2001 to get into an exercise program and said many of the moves are similar to those used in other forms of exercise.

"It's like moving yoga," she said. "You must have a peaceful mind, relax the body, a good center of balance, good breathing and focus the eyes."

May Tian, systems specialist for the information systems office and Zongzhu Lin, professor of mathematics, led the demonstration along with Sun.

Ann Murray, associate professor in family studies and human services, and Colette Remsbecker, general maintenance and repair technician for the Advanced Manufacturing Institute, also participated.

Remsbecker and Murray began taking Tai Chi classes at Ahearn Field House two months ago. Remsbecker said she took up the art to get exercise.

"I wanted to improve my balance, my discipline and control," she said. "Hopefully, I will eventually increase my body tone."

Tai Chi is not as easy as it looks, Remsbecker said.

"I have to practice every night," she said. "It's very difficult to learn a routine. You have to deal with the music and your balance and control. There's also trying to learn how to work with other people."

There were other demonstrations in addition to the Tai Chi performance, including displays of traditional Chinese clothing, calligraphy and landscape pictures of China.

The pictures were divided up by the geography of the country.

Students from China provided many of the displays in articles they brought from home, said Yu Chen, graduate student in industrial engineering.

"With the displays, we can make the American people understand about our culture," Chen said. "These really show how we celebrate our new year and different parts of our culture."

Sun, Tian and Lin will perform another Tai Chi routine incorporating hand-held fans during the Chinese Spring Festival Gala from 3 to 5 p.m. Sunday at McCain Auditorium.

Interactive food show draws capacity crowd to sample traditional Chinese food, music

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Extra chairs had to be placed along the walls to accommodate the crowd attending the Interactive Chinese Food Show from 4 to 6 p.m. Thursday at the International Student Center.

K-State students, faculty and residents of Manhattan attended the festival, which drew a crowd that was more than the capacity of the building.

People sat along the walls of the room, at tables, and on couches and chairs in the entry of the building or simply knelt and ate the food that was offered.

More than 50 people attended the festival. Even though the crowd was at capacity, people continued to arrive throughout the event.

"I was just interested to see what they have to offer," said Jiayi Li, freshman at Manhattan High School, as she waited for the festival to begin.

Bamboo Buffet sponsored the festival. Owner Danny Fang, lacking a rolling pin, used a carrot to demonstrate how to make Chinese dumplings.

Some came to learn how to make Chinese food. Others came to meet friends.

Bob Taussig, former professor at the College of Veterinary Medicine, attended the food show with his wife Mary.

"That's what we look forward to is meeting our friends," Mary Taussig said.

The Taussigs attend many international functions at K-State, Bob said.

Traditional Chinese music played in the background as the festival began. A line quickly formed for the many varieties of Chinese foods available.

Laura Villalba, Spanish instructor at K-State, watched happily as her daughter Fiorella enjoyed the music and food.

"We always try to experience new things and meet new people," Villalba said.

Villalba said she thinks raising her daughter to enjoy more international events and experience different cultures will help her to be more culturally aware, she said.

"I hope so. I really do," she said.

NY to sue Exxon Mobil over slow cleanup of underground oil slick

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — New York's attorney general told Exxon Mobil and two other oil companies Thursday that he intends to sue them for taking decades to clean up a giant underground pond of petroleum left by the refineries that once lined Brooklyn's waterfront.

In a statement, Andrew Cuomo accused Exxon Mobil of leaving a "toxic footprint" in New York City, then doing "as little as possible to address the dangers that it created."

The slick, hidden beneath more than 50 acres of land, is believed to have been floating on Brooklyn's water table for at least half a century.

Exxon accepted responsibility for much of the spill in 1990 and constructed a pumping system that has helped to gradually extract 9.3 million gallons of oil from the ground.

It has said the recovery's delicate nature makes it difficult to extract any faster.

"We take our environmental responsibility very seriously, and we are very committed to cleaning up the site," company spokeswoman Prem Nair said.

Other defendants will include the oil companies Chevron and BP, which own facilities believed to have contributed to the decades of pollution. When the Coast Guard first noticed the spill in 1978, some experts estimated that it totaled 17 million gallons — about 6 million more than the tanker Exxon Valdez is believed to have spilled.

Exactly how the oil got in the ground is a matter of debate.

One theory is that it is from a 1950 explosion, while Exxon says it was probably from a series of leaks from now-closed refineries and terminals in the area.

The state also intends to sue two other companies for unrelated contamination in the creek: KeySpan, which is responsible for a defunct gas plant, and Phelps Dodge, which operated a now-demolished copper smelting plant.

Pianist, guitarist next act in BirdHouse series

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An artist critics have compared to Randy Newman and Bruce Springsteen is performing this evening as part of the BirdHouse Acoustic Music Series.

Jeff Black will perform at 7 tonight at the Manhattan Arts Center, 1520 Poyntz Ave.

In a recent issue, Billboard magazine compared Black's piano work to Newman and his guitar work to Springsteen.

Other than the piano and guitar, Black also plays the banjo and sings.

"It's like good, old-fashioned bar music," said Tess Purvis, director of marketing and programs for the arts center. "One guy with his guitar or his piano singing really heartfelt songs."

Purvis said this will be Black's second time performing in the BirdHouse series and she looks forward to the show.

"We're excited he's coming," she said. "He is a rising star and we love to have him."

Robert Bear, instructor in biology and booking agent for the series, said he has seen Black perform several times and has even spent time with him. He said people who enjoy country, blues or folk music would like Black's work.

Bear said he first saw Black perform in Nebraska in 2001.

He said his favorite song of Black's is "To Be with You" from his third album, "B-Sides and Confessions Volume One," released in 2003.

"It's just a very well-written song that reminds me of Michelle," Bear said. "She's my other in this world."

Black released his first album, "Birmingham Road," in 1998 and his second, "Honey and Salt," in 2003. He released his fourth and latest album, "Tin Lily," in 2005.

Country music artists Waylon Jennings and Blackhawk recorded songs that Black wrote, according to a release from the arts center.

Tickets to the show are $16 for adults, $14 for military and $13 for students at the arts center box office, Clafin Books & Copies or The Dusty Bookshelf.

The BirdHouse series started in 1994. Steve Martini, acting director of Peters Recreation Complex and David Kamerer and Gretchen Holden, Manhattan residents, organized the series.

Each year, eight artists travel to the arts center to perform live music with acoustic instruments as part of the BirdHouse series.

"Seeing someone playing live, acoustically, is just pretty amazing," Bear said.

Steven Hilburn, junior in chemistry and psychology, and Clare Feeley, sophomore in speech, filed Thursday for student body president and vice president.

Pair's platform includes 'absolutely no action'

By Ben Hedges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two more candidates entered the race for student body president and vice president Thursday.

Steven Hilburn, junior in chemistry and psychology, and Clare Feeley, sophomore in speech, filed for student body president and vice president, respectively.

Hilburn ran for vice president last year alongside John Wallisch, now a senior in psychology.

He said he enjoyed running and wanted to try a run at the presidency.

"I had a lot of fun doing it last year and decided to give it another go," Hilburn said.

Feeley said Hilburn used an unusual method of persuasion to get her to join the ticket.

"Steve conned me into thinking I was signing up for a shuffleboard," Feeley said. "But it was actually an SGA application."

With the slogan "Lots of ideas, absolutely no action,"

Hilburn and Feeley are concerned with many issues they say are plaguing K-State. Parking on campus is one of the main issues the pair wants to address.

"We want to eliminate all parking spots on campus except for the president and vice president," Feeley said. "We feel that will eliminate the parking situation."

The two said they also are concerned with how students treat Varney's Bookstore.

"We think students are victimizing Varney's by buying books online," Feeley said.

Hilburn said Varney's should be the only retail outlet where students buy books.

"We feel that students should be forced to buy books at Varney's," he said, "and we feel for profit, Varney's should have a 100-percent markup on its prices."

Hilburn and Feeley said they also want to construct a seven-foot, platinum statue of Willie the Wildcat to beautify the K-State campus.

Both candidates have limited student government experience.

Feeley said she was a student representative in high school and has taken a political science class.

Hilburn said he has no student government experience except for his run for vice president last year.

"I used to feel that student politics was overrated," Hilburn said.

When asked about backlash from other candidates for not taking their campaign seriously, Hilburn said he and Feeley want to motivate students who normally wouldn't vote to cast their ballot.

"Doing this is getting more people involved," Hilburn said.

Hilburn said he will take a more laid-back approach this year.

He said he feels he and his running mate were too successful in last year's campaign.

"I didn't quite fail enough last year," Hilburn said.

Astronaut sets U.S. spacewalking record during 3rd walk in 9 days

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Astronaut Michael Lopez-Alegria broke the U.S. record for most time walking in space Thursday as he and another astronaut did maintenance work outside the international space station during their third spacewalk in nine days.

Lopez-Alegria surpassed the previous U.S. record of 58 hours and 32 minutes midway through his chores with fellow American Sunita Williams. He has a ways to go to claim the all-time record, though — Russian Anatoly Solovyov has logged more than 82 hours.

The 6 1/2-hour spacewalk ended at 3:06 p.m. EST.

"They were all three extremely difficult (spacewalks), and you guys made them look not necessarily easy, but the way they should look," Mission Control said. "You did an excellent job."

Lopez-Alegria and Williams finished a primary mission of the their spacewalk, tossing quilt-sized thermal sheets from the international space station.

The two large thermal covers were folded up with smaller shrouds that had been covering an electronics box and were used to prevent parts of the space station from getting too hot or cold.

Engineers believe they will burn up upon entering Earth's atmosphere in about three weeks.

"I don't think I could do it any better than that," Lopez-Alegria said to Williams as the first package floated away.

Lopez-Alegria joked they had an easier time folding up the shrouds than their spacewalking colleagues who helped fold up a stubborn solar array during space shuttle Discovery's mission to the space station last December.

"Solar arrays wish they could retract this well!" he said.

In the past, engineers wanted to make sure that jettisoning items wouldn't strike the station, but they have grown more comfortable with the idea.

"We've gotten more proficient in jettison analysis and understanding the safety of jettisoning," lead spacewalk officer Glenda Laws said recently. "We expect the shrouds ... to look like a large bundle of laundry."

The astronauts also finished hooking up cables to a new system that will allow power from the station to be shared with a docked shuttle so it can stay longer; added a platform that will hold a storage container; and took photos of a docking port.

During the two earlier spacewalks, the stations' astronauts had changed the space station's cooling system from a temporary system to a permanent one that will allow the addition of new components constructed by both the Europeans and the Japanese.

The spacewalk marked the first time three spacewalks have been conducted in such a short period without a space shuttle docked to it.

The first two spacewalks had similar tasks, and flight controllers thought they could save preparation time by squeezing them together.

Lopez-Alegria planned to conduct a fourth spacewalk Feb. 22 with Russian flight engineer Mikhail Tyurin.

That spacewalk will be Lopez-Alegria's 10th. The previous U.S. time record for spacewalks was held by astronaut Jerry Ross, who has made nine.

Lopez-Alegria's new U.S. record is 61 hours and 22 minutes. Williams, who broke a record for female spacewalkers last Sunday, now has 29 hours and 17 minutes of walking in space.

During Thursday's spacewalk, chief astronaut Steve Lindsey chatted with the spacewalk ground team.

A day earlier, he had escorted astronaut Lisa Nowak back to Houston from Florida, where she was charged with attempted murder and attempted kidnapping, accused of trying to harm a woman she viewed as a rival for the attentions of astronaut William Oefelein. NASA has put her on leave for 30 days and removed her from mission activities.

New Orleans residents sue Army Corps

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW ORLEANS — A group of residents whose neighborhood was flooded during Hurricane Katrina added a lawsuit Thursday to the mounting case against the Army Corps of Engineers, saying the agency knew flood walls were unstable.

The suit, which seeks class-action status and unspecified damages, was filed in federal court on behalf of seven residents of the Lakeview area near the 17th Street Canal. The suit alleges that dredging approved by the Corps weakened the soil that supported the canal's levees.

If class-action status is granted, tens of thousands of New Orleans residents could be included, and claims in the tens of billions of dollars could be involved.

In a decision last week, a federal judge allowed a suit to proceed charging that the Corps was liable for the flooding of eastern New Orleans and suburban St. Bernard Parish by waters from the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet.

A team of trial lawyers led by Joseph Bruno filed the suit Thursday.

"That decision is a clear blueprint on the court's thinking," Bruno said at a news conference at his law office downtown. "We have asked for every damage that could possibly be sustained by anyone in this horrible catastrophe."

The viability of Thursday's suit hinges on whether the 17th Street Canal should be considered a navigable waterway or a flood-control project.

If the court determines that the 17th Street Canal was a flood-control project, the 1928 Flood Control Act would shield the Corps from liability.

Though primarily a drainage waterway, fishing boats and other small vessels were tied up along the canal near its mouth for years before Katrina.

The plaintiffs argue the Corps knew about the weak soil and that academic studies and maps dating to the mid-1800s showed that the ground under the canal walls comprised unstable soil.

Minority paper sought to raise campus awareness on matters of diversity

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tucked away in a box on the fifth floor of Hale Library lies a stack of yellowed newspapers with words and images of the past.

These pieces of K-State history are decades' worth of documentation shedding light on minorities' struggles and accomplishments.

MAKING A NAME FOR ITSELF

Self proclaimed as K-State's ethnic newspaper, Alliance served as a monthly publication highlighting minority issues.

The Office of Diversity produced the paper from 1978 to 1991.

Anne Butler, associate professor at Kentucky State University, was the adviser for Alliance.

The name Alliance came after a lot of brainstorming, Baker said.

"We wanted a title that could be consistent with the goals of the paper," she said. "A name not to be viewed as an underground rag sheet or militant."

Butler said the name Alliance represented the work done to create an atmosphere of justice and to ensure equality by uniting people of similar thought around like ideas.

SETTING GOALS

Butler said one editor and two part-time student reporters were able to create and maintain the newspaper.

They were able to gain attention from the K-State community, as well as attention from other universities and publications.

"We knew we had to gain favor with the administration, the larger university community and with students of color," she said.

She said by maintaining favor, the paper accomplished a lot for "students of color" at K-State.

"Alliance provided some positive media for minorities," Butler said. "We observed that any time something was printed in the Mercury or the Collegian about minorities, it was negative."

She said another goal for the publication was for students of color to understand the significance of their heritage.

"Once they understand who they are and where they came from, they can learn what they can become," Butler said.

SETTING TRENDS

Butler said she surveyed colleges and universities across the nation and found K-State had something exclusive.

"We were a frontrunner for a publication of this type," she said.

The paper received positive responses from various industries looking for vehicles to reach minority students, she said.

"It could have really evolved into a major publication," she said. "Not just for the Midwest, but also for students of color on predominantly white universities."

NIXING THE STATUS QUO

Susan Allen, director of K-State's Women's Center, said she spent the majority of her 30s working as the editor of Alliance.

"Me and Anne really wanted to change the system and structure at K-State," Allen said. "We hit it off well. We both needed each other (and) we both had things that needed to be done that matched."

Their mission focused on fairness and equality for all people on K-State's campus, Allen said.

Allen, who studied anthropology and journalism in college, added depth to the paper's articles and editorials, Butler said.

Allen recalled the first time she walked into the Office of Minority Affairs and the director said, "What is this little white girl doing in here?"

"I was so enthused to be working for the paper when the director asked me, 'What do you care?'" Allen said.

She was ready to get to work, she said.

Allen usually wrote most of the content for the paper, including columns she said were forward-thinking at the time.

Due to minimal funding, the paper was limited, but Allen said it was still quality.

"When I did the first paper, it was all on a typewriter," she said. "Then I reduced the text on a copy machine."

She said the paper had almost no money, and all the money it did have went to production.

GAINING CREDIBILITY

At the time, Allen said the K-State Collegian did not look at the publication seriously because Alliance did not pose a threat to it.

"Over the years, people did start reading and actually found the paper valuable," Allen said.

She said other publications like the Wichita Eagle even published articles from Alliance.

The content of Alliance was not the average news stories seen in mainstream newspapers, Allen said.

"We wanted to really show what was going on," she said.

The paper was inclusive, offering content relating to blacks, Hispanics and Asians, Butler said.

"It is very important for people in general to learn to look at the world with a broader perspective," she said.

TONING THINGS DOWN

Allen's perspective was sometimes watered down, she said, because of the controversy it might cause.

Her last days on the paper were shortened due to a column she wanted to write in the late 1980s about affirmative action.

"After that column couldn't run, I quit," she said. "I really wanted change to happen and I didn't anticipate how long it would take."

She said the column was an "in-your-face piece."

Allen said her reward for working on the paper is having professors use the articles that were published.

CREATING AN OUTLET

The paper also served as an outlet for minority students in journalism who wanted to take part in the types of media offered by the university.

"When (Allen) left, there was student interest in the paper and we decided to allow students to take over," Butler said.

Barbara Baker, undergraduate coordinator and academic adviser at Cambridge College, graduated from K-State with a degree in radio-television and was a reporter for Alliance.

Baker's job was to research news topics, interview faculty of color and ensure minority-related events on campus received adequate coverage.

Baker said she developed a passion for writing about multicultural affairs.

"Being a part of Alliance gave me an early foundation to help me build my confidence, ability to write and connect with other people," she said.

Baker said Butler was inspirational in her life.

"Without her, I would not have been able to have such a strong foundation of who I was," she said.

CUTTING FUNDING

According to a Collegian article published Feb. 18, 1988, Alliance's budget was $1,350, which the Minority Affairs Office provided.

Butler said the paper was not able to continue because of a lack of funding.

She said due to a series of budget cuts made in the early 1990s, priorities had to be re-ordered.

"It was hard," Butler said. "We worked on a shoe-string budget."

Several challenges face developing a newspaper whose focus is students of color on a predominantly white campus, she said.

"We had a blueprint for success," she said. "The fact was, we were not able to rally administrative and financial support to get it going."

Manhattan groups brainstorm to solve city preservation issues

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Historic preservation groups in Manhattan found they had several issues in common Thursday night.

Members of the Manhattan/Riley County Preservation Alliance, Downtown Manhattan Inc. and the City of Manhattan Historic Resources Board discussed current projects and future plans at the Union Pacific Depot at the first Historic Summit.

Common issues included design guidelines for downtown, a preservation planner, prevention of demolition of neglected buildings, infrastructure and codes.

Lisa Rockley, executive director of Downtown Manhattan Inc., said the downtown redevelopment project sheds light on the need for cohesive design guidelines for downtown as the north and south projects already are underway.

"We are trying to find a way to intertwine (the projects) so we have one downtown redevelopment plan and not three different plans," she said.

The groups also discussed prevention of demolition by neglect. Many buildings that have a strong history are falling into disrepair and then being demolished, said Judine Mecseri, president of MRC-PA.

"It's easier to tear them down and demolish them than it is to fix them up," she said.

While the issues the groups raised are specific, they lead to broader issues, said Bonnie Lynn-Sherow, summit organizer and associate professor of history.

"All of these speak to the fact that it's not easy to take care of a historic property," she said.

Sidewalks downtown are in disrepair, which affects local businesses, Lynn-Sherow said. She said it is an issue when guests at her bed and breakfast want to go to Harry's Uptown.

"It's only two blocks, but I will frequently tell people to drive because they can't walk because the sidewalk is so bad," she said.

The groups also discussed what the city could do to help with historical preservation.

An idea to help with sidewalk repair was to have service groups get together and do the work as a project. Someone also mentioned sending out an information sheet with instructions on how to repair sidewalks and a or she could offer the city guidance on how to do so.

The group said code teams who would inspect houses all at once after a permit is taken out also would be helpful.

"You get these people all to come to you in one meeting and approve you in one plan right there," Sherow said.

Another concern was the need for education.

"When you click on the city's Web site or when you click on the Chamber's Web site, the story of Manhattan is not a central force," she said.

Children also should learn about the city's history in school by visiting various sites so they can become interested and educated, Lynn-Sherow said.

"You have the opportunity to grow little preservationists in your community by having that dialogue," she said.

White House defends Pelosi's use of Air Force transport plane for security

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Democrat Nancy Pelosi received some rare help Thursday from the White House against a barrage of Republican criticism over how the new House speaker intends to get back home.

For security reasons, Pelosi is entitled to fly to her San Francisco district on military planes.

The House sergeant-at-arms, who helps oversee security for the House, suggested that flying nonstop would be the safest way home for Pelosi, who is next after the vice president in the line of presidential succession.

Republicans, led by aggressive junior lawmakers, seized on the most extreme possibility: Pelosi's flying on the military equivalent of a Boeing 757 with the latest in travel comforts.

Too expensive, some critics said. Too polluting, others said. Too much ado about nothing, the White House weighed in.

"I have never asked for any larger plane," Pelosi said. "I have said that I am happy to ride commercial if the plane they have doesn't go coast to coast."

"This is a silly story and I think it's been unfair to the speaker," said presidential spokesman Tony Snow.

During debate on a bill that encouraged research on advanced fuels, Republicans proposed an amendment urging diversity of planes' fuel loads to include "domestically produced alternative fuels."

The amendment singled out "passenger planes with 42 business class seats capable of transcontinental flights" — exactly the specifications of an Air Force C-32 jet.

"The jet that Pelosi has produces 10,000 pounds of carbon dioxide an hour, far more than the previous speaker used," said Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C. Pelosi's predecessor was Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Flying in a large Air Force plane appears to remove spending controls from operations and dramatically increases impact on especially climate change, said Rep. Mark Kirk, R-Ill.

Snow, too, came under criticism.

"He does not have a duty, as I do, to come to this floor and to discuss the consequences for our taxpayers," said Rep. John Shadegg, R-Ariz.

After the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the Bush administration agreed to provide Hastert with a military plane for added security during trips back home. Hastert flew in a commuter-sized Air Force jet.

House Sergeant-at-Arms Bill Livingood said in a statement he recommended the Pentagon continue the practice, begun with Hastert, of flying the speaker back home.

"The fact that Speaker Pelosi lives in California compelled me to request an aircraft that is capable of making nonstop flights for security purposes, unless such an aircraft is unavailable," he said.

The Pentagon this week told Pelosi's staff she would be provided with a plane but the size would be based on availability and nonstop service could not be guaranteed.

The Defense Department's guidelines say Pelosi could be accompanied by family members, provided they pay the government coach fare. The plane could not be used for travel to political events. Members of Congress could join her if the House ethics committee clears the travel.

Pelosi speculated that Pentagon officials were distorting the story as retribution for her stance against the war and former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"Why would the Department of Defense be not denying this information that has been conveyed?" she asked.

"Why are they feeding the flames?"

Snow called Pelosi's office to make sure she knew the White House supported her use of a military plane.

He also distanced the White House from the GOP's take on the matter. The Republican National Committee said Pelosi was on a power trip.

Snow, asked whether the RNC is free to go after Pelosi on its own, said, "Well, apparently they did this time."

Gunmen in southern Arizona shoot at vehicle filled with illegal immigrants, killing 3

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TUCSON, Ariz. — Gunmen stopped a pickup truck full of illegal immigrants, shot some and took the rest captive Thursday in an attack that left at least three people dead and two wounded, authorities said.

Officials have not determined who the gunmen were but believe the driver, who was probably a smuggler, escaped along with a guide. They are still at large. Officials believe at least two of the immigrants were Guatemalan.

The men shot at least five people, three fatally, along a known smuggling corridor near Tucson, and forced several others in the group of nine or 10 immigrants to leave with them, Pima County officials said. The victims are thought to be two men and a 15-year-old girl.

Another 15-year-old girl was later found with slight injuries, and another person, apparently uninjured, was found in the afternoon, officials said. Two men who were not injured told authorities what happened, officials said.

Investigators did not immediately know a motive for Thursday's attack, but gangs of bandits are known to roam border areas preying on illegal immigrants as they cross into the country. Feuding among smuggling organizations also is not uncommon, sometimes involving demands for ransoms from the immigrants' relatives to gain their freedom.

This attack occurred on a dirt road near the Silverbell Mine, about 20 miles northwest of Tucson, said Rick Kastigar, Pima County sheriff's criminal investigations chief.

Gunmen in a vehicle shot at the pickup and forced it to stop, killing one man and the teenager, authorities believe.

Another man was fatally wounded, one woman was shot in her chest and suffered a neck injury, and a third man was shot in the hand and apparently lost several fingers.

The gunmen continued north and east, forcing several immigrants to go with them, officials said.

The man with the hand injury and the injured woman flagged down a rancher, who called authorities, officials said. Sheriff's officials found the third person dead along the road, and the two remaining wounded were taken to a hospital.

Authorities were trying to determine any link to a Jan. 27 confrontation about 40 miles to the north, possibly between human smugglers, that left one man dead and another wounded. In that incident, four men wearing camouflage uniforms and berets stopped a vehicle carrying illegal immigrants.

K-State grad shares spotlight with legends in Rock and Roll Hall of Fame

By Eric Brown
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In 1988, the third class of inductees into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame was a list of legends that included The Beatles, The Beach Boys, Bob Dylan and The Supremes. But one K-State alumnus was quicker than even these rock 'n' roll pioneers to receive this prestigious recognition.

Twenty years ago, Jerry Wexler, former co-owner and producer for Atlantic Records and a K-State alumnus, was awarded an induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in Cleveland.

Up to his induction in 1987, Wexler oversaw record production for an array of musical prodigies like Aretha Franklin, Wilson Pickett, Ray Charles, Willie Nelson and Bob Dylan during his then-44-year career, according to The New Grove Dictionary of American Music.

Along with spending studio time with some of the best artists in rock and soul music history, Wexler is also famous for breaking color barriers in the industry and even coined the universal phrase "rhythm and blues," which up to that point was referred to as "race music," according to the Atlantic Records Web site.

Joining Wexler in the hall of fame's second class of inductees was fellow partner at Atlantic Records, founder Ahmet Ertegun. With Wexler and Ertegun spearheading the operation, Atlantic Records, which started in 1947 as an independent label primarily focused on jazz, crossed over into multiple genres and became a major player in the music business by the 1960s.

The rest of the 1987 Rock and Roll Hall of Fame inductees include Leonard Chess, The Coasters, Eddie Cochran, Bo Diddley, Aretha Franklin, Marvin Gaye, Bill Haley, Louis Jordan, B.B. King, Jerry Leiber and Mike Stoller, Clyde McPhatter, Ricky Nelson, Roy Orbison, Carl Perkins, Smokey Robinson, Big Joe Turner, T-Bone Walker, Muddy Waters and Hank Williams.

Wexler, born in 1917 in New York City, started his education at K-State in fall 1936. But before he graduated, the United States Navy drafted him in 1941 during World War II, according to Allmusic.com.

After the war, Wexler re-enrolled at K-State and graduated in 1946 with a degree in journalism. Following graduation, Wexler went to write for Billboard magazine.

Then in 1953, according to the Atlantic Records Web site, Wexler joined Atlantic as a producer and partner, paying $2,063.25 for a 13-percent share.

The Rock and Roll Hall of Fame Web site noted before the advent of rock, the term "producer" wasn't even part of the recording-industry vocabulary.

"No one really knew how to make a record when I started," Wexler said in an interview on the Web site. "You simply went into the studio, turned on the mic and said 'play.'"

With the creation of independent record labels in the late 1940s and early 1950s came a new breed of hands-on music-industry entrepreneurs. Wexler was among the most influential and important of these while at Atlantic Records, according to the hall of fame's Web site.

Dr. Craig Parker, associate professor in music at K-State, noted Wexler did more than help pioneer the music industry. He helped break down its color barrier.

"He did a lot for bringing black music to a white audience," Parker said. "At the time, he was one of the very few in the music industry who were interested in aiming certain genres of music at previously unexposed audiences."

Along with breaking music's color barriers and producing many of the rock 'n' roll and soul giants of his time, Wexler, who was named Record Executive of the Year in 1967, also committed his label with the Muscle Shoals Sound Rhythm Section in 1969.

This move enabled the ensemble to borrow funds to begin its first studio, which would develop into one of the major recording centers in the country.

Those who recorded with Wexler in the Muscle Shoals studio include Willie Nelson, Cher, Dire Straits and Bob Dylan.

According to the New Grove Dictionary of American Music, Wexler continued working with Atlantic Records until 1978, when he joined Warner Bros. and continued his career in record production as their senior vice president.

In 1986, just before his hall-of-fame induction, Wexler donated the Jerry Wexler Collection to K-State, a group of nearly 2,000 recordings in the Morse Department of Special Collections of Hale Library.

The library's Web site notes the core of the collection consists of recordings from the mid-1960s through the mid-1980s.

"It's a generous donation on his part, and it's a great wealth of music history and knowledge from someone who helped pioneer music into what it's become today," said Phil Ward, graduate student in music. "I think it's something that K-State is lucky to have."

CELEB NEWS

Anna Nicole Smith found dead

HOLLYWOOD, Fla. — Anna Nicole Smith, 39, died Thursday after collapsing at a hotel.

Edwina Johnson, chief investigator for the Broward County Medical Examiner's Office, said the cause of death was under investigation and an autopsy would be done today.

Just five months ago, Smith's 20-year-old son, Daniel, died suddenly in the Bahamas in what was believed to be drug-related.

Seminole Police Chief Charlie Tiger said a private nurse called 911 after finding Smith unresponsive in her sixth-floor room at the hotel, which is on an Indian reservation. He said Smith's bodyguard administered CPR, but she was declared dead at a hospital.

"Undoubtedly it will be found at the end of the day that drugs featured in her death as they did in the death of poor Daniel (Smith's son)," said a former attorney, Michael Scott.

Smith attorney Ron Rale told The Associated Press that Smith had been suffering flu symptoms and a fever and was still grieving over her son.

Critics give 'Because I Said So' overly harsh reviews

"Because I Said So"

Movie review by Eileen Laux

Let's begin with the criticism of "Because I Said So." So far, I think it's safe to say the critics went a little overboard with this one.

Yes, I thought some of the humor and characters were a bit over-the-top, but I did not walk out of the theater wanting my money back (which is how most of them painted the movie — as a disaster that was a complete waste of time).

Did I absolutely love it and want to see it again? Well, no. Was it a horrible hour and 42 minutes that I will never get back? Again, no. The film was an enjoyable story with drops of humor weaved throughout.

"Because I Said So" is the story of Daphne Wilder (Diane Keaton), the overbearing mother of three girls: Maggie (Lauren Graham), Mae (Piper Perabo) and Milly (Mandy Moore). As Daphne's 60th birthday approaches, she begins to focus all her attention on Milly's love life. This results in Milly's heightening frustration with her mother.

The acting is not bad, especially from Gabriel Macht (Johnny), one of Milly's love interests.

Lauren Graham steals most of the scenes with her dry humor and upbeat delivery. Moore and Perabo weren't bad, with Moore seeming to stretch her acting skills a little bit.

The overall theme of the film is how far a mother's love will and should go. From my perspective as a daughter and the youngest of three sisters, I think the premise was strong. The story line flowed nicely. However, many scenes were stagnant, which caused a holdup in the progression of the film.

Most critics have questioned Diane Keaton's film choice. But let's be honest — she's Diane Keaton. She's done "Annie Hall" and "Reds." Is her film career over? No, and she has paid her dues and deserves to choose different roles, whether or not they are worthy of an Academy Award.

Critics have begun to fit their mold. They don't seem to like films that aren't artistic. Hopefully, I am one of the few to break the mold.

The film was full of slapstick humor, but there were smart, funny moments throughout. I didn't walk into the theater expecting Shakespeare, but it fulfilled my expectations for a funny, heartwarming movie about a mother's relationship with her daughters.

WARM | Layering useful for men, women

"I think a lot of designers are making snow boots a cute and stylish thing to have, instead of a (necessity) for winter," she said.

Layering also is a must-have for men. Thornton said men often wear denim jeans and layer button-up shirts with cozy sweaters to stay trendy. Blacks and grays are very "in" colors for guys this time of year, Thornton said.

On campus, she said she sees women sporting fingerless gloves or mittens and many guys keeping their ears warm with snowboard hats.

Donna Aronson, district manager of Trendy with a Twist Boutique, said heavy jackets and sweaters are a best-bet for campus. She also advises students to layer up.

Layering is not the only trend students have adopted; sipping on a warm beverage also helps keep the cold away.

Shops included Radina's Coffee House and Bakery, the Bluestem Bistro, Espresso Royale, Kitchen Capers and Dara's Fast Lane all said the café mocha was one of the five most popular drinks.

Next in line were flavored lattes — vanilla being the most popular flavor — cappuccinos, hot chocolate and the classic brew.

If you're fed up with the cold weather, grab a hot beverage, a few cozy shirts and stay toasty and trendy. Don't worry — spring break is almost here.

Below are a few recipes for hot beverages that are easy to make, easy on your wallet

Apple cider:

3 cinnamon sticks
3 whole star anise, optional
1 tablespoon whole cloves
1 teaspoon freshly grated nutmeg
1/2 teaspoon ground ginger
6 cups unfiltered apple cider
1/2 cup dark rum (optional)

Place first five ingredients in the center of a 12-inch square of cheesecloth. Wrap tightly and tie securely with kitchen twine.

In large saucepan over low heat, bring cider to a simmer. Add cheesecloth packet and cook 10 to 15 minutes. Stir in rum, if desired. Remove cloth packet. Ladle into mugs and garnish with additional cinnamon sticks.

Hot caramel apple cider:

1 quart fresh apple cider
2 tablespoons firmly packed dark brown sugar
3 tablespoons caramel ice cream topping
1 can Redi-Whip whipped cream

Pour apple cider into a saucepan. Stir in dark brown sugar and caramel ice cream topping; simmer until hot and well-blended. Pour into mugs and top each with a generous squirt of Redi-Whip whipped cream. Makes 1 quart.

Candy bar hot chocolate:

2 egg yolks
2 ounces milk-chocolate candy bar with fine nuts (such as Toblerone)
1 cup milk

Beat the egg yolks in a small bowl; set aside. Coarsely chop chocolate and place in a 2-cup, microwave-safe glass measuring cup with a spout. Add milk. Place the measuring cup, uncovered, in the microwave. Whisking once or twice, cook on medium high (70-percent power) until chocolate is melted and well blended, 2 1/2 to 3 minutes.

Remove cup from microwave and slowly pour chocolate into the reserved egg yolks, whisking constantly. Return mixture to the measuring cup and cook in microwave until heated through, about one minute.

You might need to rotate the measuring cup if your microwave doesn't have a carousel.

Pour into mugs and serve.

Makes 2 servings.

Vanilla cocoa:

1 quart milk
1/3 cup granulated sugar
1/4 cup cocoa
1/4 teaspoon vanilla (or 1/2 teaspoon cinnamon)
Whipped cream for topping

In saucepan, combine sugar and cocoa. Add a few tablespoons of milk and heat over medium-high heat, stirring constantly. When the sugar, cocoa and milk have formed a paste, add the remainder of the milk plus the vanilla extract or cinnamon and heat until steaming.

Pour into mugs, top with whipped cream and serve immediately. Makes 4 servings.

Mexican cocoa:

This is the traditional accompaniment for sweet tamales.
2 cups milk
3 (1-inch) cinnamon sticks
4 ounces bittersweet chocolate, broken into small pieces
2 tablespoons dark brown sugar
Ground cinnamon (optional)

Heat milk and cinnamon sticks over low heat until steaming. Do not boil.

Place chocolate and sugar in warm, small bowl. Discard cinnamon sticks. Pour milk over chocolate and sugar and let stand 1 minute. Whisk until dissolved. Serve in mugs with a sprinkling of cinnamon, if desired. Makes 2 servings.

Vanilla chai:

4 cups water
3 cardamom pods
3 whole allspice
3 whole cloves
1 cinnamon stick
1-inch vanilla bean
1/3 cup honey
1 tablespoon black tea (4 tea bags)
Milk to taste (regular, nonfat, soy, or rice)

Put water in a saucepan with cardamom, allspice, cloves, cinnamon stick and vanilla bean. Simmer for 5 minutes, bring to a boil and pour over black tea. Let steep for a few minutes.

Add honey and milk to taste.

Defendant claims he did not slay former girlfriend, NYC stripper

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — An aspiring rock musician on trial for the slaying of a dancer who worked as a stripper testified Thursday he loved the young woman.

Paul Cortez said he never hurt Catherine Woods physically and never wanted to. When asked by his attorney if he had killed her in November 2005, he said, "No, I did not."

Cortez, 25, said though he had hoped they would rekindle what he once thought was mutual love, he was seeing other women by the time Woods was slain. He is charged with second-degree murder and faces 25 years to life in prison if convicted.

The defendant said he and Woods met in August 2004 in the gym where he was a personal trainer and were sexually intimate for the first time in November 2004.

Defense lawyer Laura Miranda elicited from Cortez an explanation for the most damning piece of evidence against him — his bloody fingerprint found on the bedroom wall in Woods' upper east side apartment, where she was slashed to death.

The lawyer asked Cortez whether he had ever gotten his hands "dirty" while touching Woods during sex, and he said he had. Miranda asked if he had touched the wall, and he said, "I might have, yes."

Cortez also answered questions about the meaning of some of his poetry and lyrics, which the prosecution says show a twisted preoccupation with violence and revenge.

The defendant said one poem that includes the line "wipes clean the shaft that cuts her throat" was inspired by women who had been damaged by men, a "dedication to those souls who had suffered so much trauma."

Woods, 21, had come to New York City hoping to make it as a dancer on Broadway and had begun dancing in topless joints to pay her expenses. Her father, Jon Woods, is the director of the Ohio State University marching band.

them to not compete with the foundation's promotion."

Legleiter said the marketing club stopped making the T-shirts because it wanted to avoid a lawsuit.

The athletic department's marketing department asked the club to collaborate on a different event, but Legleiter said he still was upset.

"I am still a little ticked off about how the athletic department went about ... "Black Out Monday" in Bramlage," he said.

"We were trying to profit off it and get more students with black T-shirts. They came up and told us, 'We're going to formally endorse it.' I'm upset about the nature of events that took place ... That time and effort is for nothing."

Legleiter said club members already were making the T-shirts before they were told to stop.

"Telling a student organization to stop doesn't seem like they went about it right," he said.

However, Legleiter said he doesn't take any issue with K-State Proud.

Mindy Weixelman, director of student life at the K-State Foundation, said the Proud campaign is going well and she looks forward to continued support.

"We have been completely overwhelmed by the excitement from K-State students about wanting to make a campaign," she said.

LOU DOUGLAS | U.S. ranks among last developing nations with regard to fuel efficiency, greenhouse emissions

Still, he said many Washington policymakers refuse to address the issue.

"You've heard of separation of church and state," Schweiger said. "In Washington today, we have separation of science and state."

The United States ranks last among major countries in fuel efficiency at less than 25 miles per gallon, Schweiger said.

He said the United States and Australia are the only developed countries not to have ratified the Kyoto Accords, which is an international treaty that requires countries to work toward reducing their greenhouse gas emissions.

"I didn't know anything about the United States not accepting the Kyoto agreement," said Lisa Erikson, sophomore in accounting. "It kind of makes you wonder why."

Quoting Winston Churchill, Schweiger said the world is about to enter a "period of consequences."

However, he said there is still time for citizens to curb the harmful and negative effects they are causing.

"There's a time frame when words still matter," Schweiger said. "We're in that time frame when our words and our voices do matter."

PEOPLE IN THE NEIGHBORHOOD

Multicultural rep tries to 'keep it real' with students

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Brandon Clark is what a Myers-Briggs personality test would call an extrovert.

Constantly working for and with the people in the multicultural community at K-State, Clark cannot seem to take the 1,000-watt smile from his face when he talks.

Clark served as president of the Black Student Union and chairman of the Big 12 Black Student Union Conference and several positions at his fraternity, Alpha Phi Alpha.

A K-State graduate, Clark works as the graduate assistant in the Multicultural Student Office and as the Alumni Association's Coordinator of Multicultural Programs. He said he hopes to continue his mission of making the college experience better for students of color, working his way up the ladder possibly into administration and eventually even as a university president.

Clark works to make his surroundings better for future generations of students.

Q: What does your position entail?

A: I primarily work with the multicultural student groups here on campus. This is their office, where they can come to organize and have a room where all of the organizations can come and find out what's going on, network and invite other groups to come out. I also relay messages from the Office of Diversity.

Mainly, I'm just here to be there for the students and to take care of any day-to-day issues or concerns and help out any way that I can to help (multicultural student groups) be successful.

Q: This isn't a 9-to-5 job, is it?

A: Not really. As a graduate assistant, it's not as hands-on as a director, but there are times when I come back after hours to speak on behalf of the office or to make sure the program went well. I do always give out my cell number, so if the students have a question outside of business hours, they can feel free to contact me.

I'm definitely not a person who is contained by office hours. If there's a way I can help you, I'll help no matter what time it is.

Q: Tell me about our your fraternity, Alpha Phi Alpha.

A: I have been told by traditionally white fraternities and sororities that it's a life-long commitment as well. But in the historically African-American fraternities and sororities, it is a totally different thing. When we say it is a life-long commitment, it really is.

Once I graduated from K-

State, I immediately joined our alumni chapter in Topeka, and I go to regional and national conventions every year.

APA has been a big part of my development and leadership growth since I've been at K-State, so it's something that is still a big part of my life.

Q: What happens in the office during Black History Month activities?

A: It's more busy for the Black Student Union and all of the activities that they have planned, but that means that its busy for the office as well.

Not only do we have different groups on campus calling, but we have high schools throughout the city and even Kansas City that want to know what's going on so that they can tell their students if they want to bring a group down.

It's definitely a month we look forward to each year.

Q: Is your job ever too busy?

A: Since I've come to K-State, I've gotten accustomed to the busyness. There are times where it gets to you, but it's definitely something I enjoy, and that's why I plan to get my master's in college student personnel.

I love working at the university and working with students. K-State was really the biggest influence for wanting to work on a college campus. I can only hope that once I leave here, I'll be able to work at another university similar to K-State with the atmosphere and the great students and staff that we have here.

Q: Why did you choose K-State?

A: It's really weird because I really thought I'd like to go to a historically black college or university, but they were all out-of-state and kind of expensive. So I started looking in-state, and being from Wichita, I definitely didn't want to go to Wichita State. KU, for some strange reason, just did not appeal to me at all.

I liked the K-State literature, so I came here for orientation, and I said, "This is the place I want to go." It just felt right.

Q: Has K-State's predominately white population ever been an issue or problem for you?

A: I won't say it's a problem as much as it has its challenges and its difficult times. Being a former Black Student Union president and member of APA, I was definitely looking for that comfort zone of people that I could identify with, and it takes some getting used to and some adjusting, and you're never quite fully, fully adjusted to it. But I can say for the most part that my experience has been positive.

So when I talk to students, I'm going to keep it real. I'm not going to paint a perfect picture of K-State, but it is by far a definitely good institution with good people where you can make it, and also you can help educate some people along the way and be educated yourself by others as well.

Q: What event are you most proud of?

A: The biggest thing I've done up here was in 2004 when I was a chair of the Big 12 Conference on Black Student Governments that came here. That was by far the biggest and most memorable thing I'll probably take away from K-State.

Lecture ticket distribution to begin

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ticket distribution for former U.S. President Bill Clinton's Landon Lecture will take place from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Feb. 21 and 22 or until all tickets are distributed. K-State student tickets will be available on the northeast side of Bramlage Coliseum, while K-State faculty and staff tickets will be available on the northwest side of Bramlage. Students, faculty and staff members must present their K-State IDs to receive a ticket, said Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series.

Each person is limited to one ticket, and those wanting to sit together should pick up tickets together since seats are reserved, Reagan said.

There are about 5,500 tickets available for students, 1,500 available for K-State faculty and staff, 800 for Fort Riley military, 200 for K-State ROTC, 400 for Landon Lecture patrons and 500 for special guests such as state legislators, governor's office officials and Kansas Board of Regents members. K-State-Salina students, faculty and staff will receive an e-mail when tickets are available for pick-up.

"This is where we start, and everything that is not used in those categories goes to the general public," Reagan said.

Any remaining tickets will be available for the general public at 10 a.m. Feb. 23 at the northwest ticket windows at Bramlage. Reagan said the number of possible general public tickets available would range from 50 to 1,000 tickets. K-State Media Relations and Marketing will put out a press release if and when general public tickets are available, Reagan said.

Jim Mueller, associate director of Athletic Operations, said there might be a crowd size similar to that of President Bush's Landon Lecture in January 2006. Of about 6,000 tickets allotted to Manhattan's campus for Bush's Landon Lecture, all were distributed by 3 p.m. Jan. 19, 2006, according to a Jan. 20, 2006, Collegian

Freezing water dip benefits Kansas Special Olympics

By Ben Hedges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The three pigs, a Viking and a group of U.S. Army soldiers braved the frozen waters of Tuttle Creek Reservoir Saturday morning.

It was all part of the third-annual Manhattan Polar Bear Plunge, benefiting the Kansas Special Olympics.

Residents from Manhattan and surrounding communities stepped forward to put the warmth of their bodies on the line for the sake of a good cause. Participants spent the past few weeks raising money for the chance to take the plunge into the icy waters of Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

The plungers represented a number of different organizations and businesses in and around Manhattan, including Alpha of Clovia, Phi Beta Sigma, KBLS-FM 102.5, Rambler's Steakhouse, the U.S. Army and local police and sheriff's departments.

A six-inch-thick sheet of ice didn't stop the plunge thanks to the Riley County Police Department. Armed with chainsaws, members of the RCPD dive team cut through the ice and carved out a lane of water for the anxious participants.

Sharita Lacey, part of the "Luck be a Lady" team from Alpha of Clovia, said she had taken the plunge three times and was glad to have more people joining her this year.

"I was just joking around my first year," Lacey, junior in animal sciences and industry, said. "I just did it by myself."

She said the team, dressed as playing cards, has grown steadily each year and she hopes to have even more teammates next year.

Kylee Grant, also part of the Clovia team, said she was nervous about jumping into the water for the first time.

"I was doing good until I saw the chopped-up ice," Grant, freshman in milling science and management, said.

Jon Dougherty, an employee of Quaker Oats, said this also was his first time participating in the plunge.

"This will be the first time - and probably the only time - I do this," Dougherty said. "Somebody at work talked me into it."

Dougherty showed up in full costume as a Viking, complete with a helmet and a cardboard ship strapped around his waist.

When the time came, the plungers made their way to the freezing lake and dove in without hesitation. Some kept it simple and jumped into the waist-deep water feet-first, while others opted for a more enthusiastic approach, diving, belly-flopping or flipping into the water.

Public Enemy member to give lecture

By Ben Hedges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A former member of the rap group Public Enemy will speak about issues of race and culture and his past experiences at 7 tonight in the K-State Student Union.

Rapper and activist Chuck D will deliver his lecture, "Rap, Race and Reality," in the Union Grand Ballroom.

Chuck D is the founder of politically charged rap group Public Enemy. Along with other rappers in the group, including Flavor Flav, Chuck D took a militant and controversial stance on rap music.

Singles like "Fight the Power" and "Bring The Noise" are among many of the songs that made Public Enemy one of the most popular and influential rap groups of this generation.

The lecture is co-sponsored by Union Program Council and Black Student Union and is part of the celebration of Black History Month.

Tristan Tafolla, co-chairman of forums committee for UPC, said he was anxious to hear what the rapper had to say.

"We wanted to do something special for Black History Month," Tafolla, junior in political science, said. "And we thought he would be a great candidate for it."

Letitia Tajuba, BSU special programming director, said Chuck D's lecture will cover not only hip-hop but also its influence on culture and racial issues. She also said she expects students to gain insight from the lecture.

"He spoke here a few years ago," Tajuba said. "And the crowd really enjoyed hearing him talk."

Kyle Malone, co-chairman of the forums committee of UPC, said he expects Chuck D to cover a number of topics that go beyond music.

"We assume he will be talking about racial issues and how to overcome them," Malone said. "But it is pretty much open to whatever he wants to talk about."

The lecture is free and seating is first come, first served, but there is a capacity limit inside the Grand Ballroom. A question-and-answer period will follow the lecture.

CEOs urge Bush toward environmental policy change

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The chief executive officers of 10 corporations urged President Bush last month to support mandatory reductions in climate-changing pollution and establish legitimate reduction targets.

"It must be mandatory, so there is no doubt about our actions," said Jim Rogers, chairman of Duke Energy, at a press conference. "The science of global warming is clear. We know enough to act now. We must act now."

In the past, Bush repeatedly has argued that voluntary efforts to reduce carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases are the best avenue to pursue. He was expected to address climate change during his State of the Union address, but instead focused on other issues.

"We can and must take prompt action to establish a coordinated, economy-wide, market-driven approach to climate protection," the executives wrote in the letter to Bush.

The group of executives, the U.S. Climate Action Partnership, includes the chief executives of Alcoa Inc., BP America Inc., DuPont Co.,

Caterpillar Inc., General Electric Co. and Duke Energy Corp.

Large industrial groups, such as the Chamber of Commerce and National Association of Manufacturers, oppose the so-called "cap and trade" proposals to reduce climate-changing pollution, which would mainly limit carbon dioxide released by burning fossil fuels.

In the letter, the executives urged Congress to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 10 percent in the next decade and at least 60 percent by the year 2050. Some politicians have supported the cap and trade proposal, like Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

As of now, it will be up to the legislature to make a change on the national scale. In response to the letter, White House press secretary Tony Snow dismissed the call for mandatory caps in dealing with the climate.

"There's been some talk about (a) sort of binding of economy-wide carbon caps, but they are not part of the president's proposal," Snow said.

Many feel the solution to the greenhouse gas problem does not lie at the national, voluntary level.

"It doesn't work, what's been proposed," said Gerry Snyder, faculty adviser for Students for Environmental Action. "Voluntarily, we haven't seen many changes."

Snyder said while some small business are showing winds of change towards alternative energy, significant steps will be necessary. He said Kansas could be a great help in the process.

"There's so much potential here, when you think about wind in Kansas," Snyder said. "One thing that hasn't been talked about is solar, since we have more than 300 days

Bizarre, funny and unusual stories from around the world

FAMILY DOG SWALLOWS $5,000 SNACK
RAISINVILLE TOWNSHIP, Mich. — Tina Burlett thought someone had broken into her house and stolen her custom-made, $5,000 wedding ring, so she called the police.
But Burlett's grandmother had a different suspect in mind: the family pooch.
X-rays proved the grandmother right. The ring was inside the belly of Burlett's pit bull, Missy, who has a taste for diamonds.
Missy had previously been caught gnawing on VCRs, electric blankets and even Burlett's diamond earring.
Dr. Linda Fung of the Country Creek Animal Hospital said she was not surprised to learn that Missy swallowed jewelry.
Fung gave Missy some peroxide, and the ring came out intact.

IF SUPER BOWL PROPOSAL FAILS, ASK HER ON LOCAL TV
SEATTLE — Rand Fishkin wanted to propose to his girlfriend with a Super Bowl advertisement. That didn't quite work out, but there was still local television, and he got the answer he wanted.
Fishkin, 27, got into the advertising gambit after a Tennessee man started a Web site to try to raise $2.6 million to buy a Super Bowl ad, but learned last fall that his dream girl would turn him down.
Fishkin took over the Web site, mysuperproposal.com. It drew 200,000 page views on the day before the game.
But CBS didn't run the ad.
So Fishkin turned to another funding source — his mom — and bought a $3,000 local ad on Tuesday during his girlfriend's favorite show, "Veronica Mars."
In his ad, Fishkin, chief executive officer of SEOMoz, a Seattle Web search engine company, held up a picture of himself and Geraldine DeRuiter, 26.
"The whole world?" he says. "This is Geraldine. She is amazing in every way."
For the last five years, we've spent the best parts of our lives together and made it through the tough times, too. I couldn't ask for anything more in my life than her love.
"And that's why I'm here today. Geraldine, will you marry me?"
Right after the ad aired, she said "yes."

CHICAGO BEARS FAN BEGINS PAINFUL NAME CHANGE
ILLINOIS — Scott Wiese is a man of his word. But soon his friends will be saying that about Peyton Manning.
Wiese, a die-hard Chicago Bears fan, will legally change his name to that of the Indianapolis Colts quarterback. He signed a pledge in front of a crowd at a Decatur bar last Friday night, vowing to adopt Manning's name if the Bears lost Sunday's Super Bowl.
The final score was Colts 29, Bears 17.
So on Tuesday, Wiese went to the Macon County Courts Facility and started the process of changing his name.
"I made the bet, and now I've got to keep it," said Wiese, 26, who lives in Forsyth, just north of Decatur.
While he pledged to take on the new identity, Wiese didn't make any promises about how long he would keep it.

GYM LETS MEMBERS GET BUFF IN THE BUFF
AMSTERDAM, Netherlands — For those who want to be really buff, a Dutch gym is introducing training sessions for nudists.
The Sunday morning sessions were added by popular demand, and "anyone who shows up just to ogle will be thrown out," said gym manager Patrick de Man in the town of Heteren.
The "nudifit" sessions have attracted a strong response, both negative and positive, he said.
Staff will remain clothed during the sessions and will ensuring clients cover machinery and bikes with towels or disposable covers, he added.

CABBIE RETURNS DIAMONDS TO TIGHTFISTED TIPPER
NEW YORK — A taxi driver returned a black bag carrying 31 diamond rings to a passenger who earlier had given him a 30-cent tip on an $11 ride.
Hours after Chowdhury Osman dropped off the passenger, he tracked her down through a flurry of phone calls and returned the bag, which she had left in the taxi's trunk.
The unidentified woman, who said she was a jeweler, offered a $100 reward.
Osman accepted the money to cover the fares he lost while tracking her down.
Osman, a Bangladesh native, told the New York Daily News that he didn't so much as consider keeping the gems.
"I'm a hard worker," Osman said. "I'm not going to take someone else's money or property to make me rich. I don't want it that way," he said.

Officials touch base on $450-million research facility

Logan C. Adams | COLLEGIAN

Lt. Gov. Mark Parkinson speaks to a group of city and university officials Friday about efforts to convince the Department of Homeland Security to build a federal disease research facility in Kansas. Manhattan and Leavenworth, Kan., are among 18 sites nationwide the department is considering for the $450 million National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility.

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas has an excellent chance of attracting a $450-million federal research facility, Lt. Gov. Mark Parkinson told a group of city and university leaders Friday morning.

The administrators met to discuss what K-State officials, state and city governments are doing to encourage the Department of Homeland Security to build the National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility in Kansas. Manhattan and Leavenworth, Kan., are among 18 sites DHS is considering for the facility.

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius created a task force in late January co-chaired by Parkinson and Dan Glickman, former U.S. Secretary of Agriculture. Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., will be honorary chair of the task force.

"We continue to believe that the two Kansas sites are the best," Parkinson said. "The job of the task force will be to convince Homeland Security that they are the best."

City Commission members pledged $5 million in help toward the construction of the facility last week, and the Kansas House and Senate unanimously passed a concurrent resolution promising support should a Kansas site be chosen.

Officials are eager to land the NBAF, as it would bring a large, complex and long-term construction project as well as hundreds of high-paying jobs wherever it is built. Parkinson said it could effectively triple the number of scientists at K-State working in the areas of animal science and food safety.

Even more, he said, it would cement the area as a hub for the animal science and agricultural industries. Parkinson said the Manhattan-Kansas City region could become to animal science what Wichita is to aviation.

The Biosecurity Research Institute in Roberts Hall is expected to increase Kansas' odds of getting the federal facility because it will be available for DHS research right away while the new facility will take years to build, he said. If Manhattan were chosen, the facility would be built just north of Roberts Hall at the southeast corner of Kimball and Denison avenues.

"We think that a major advantage for our proposal is to be able to say, 'Hey, you might not have your new building until 2015, but we've got a building right here that's available,'" Parkinson said.

He listed Kansas' central location and history with animal sciences as other reasons the state's chances are good.

The subject of safety came up at the meeting, as the facility would house and do research on diseases dangerous to America's food supply. Mayor Bruce Snead said that could actually be better for the community because emergency responders are trained better because of the facilities' presence.

"Having a facility like this here is a real leg up in response," Snead said. "It increases the safety in Kansas and the local community to have this facility and the BRI here."

K-State President Jon We-

Expected timeline for National Bio and Agro-Defense facility

Feb. 16 — Proposals due
April 19 — Site visit from Department of Homeland Security
Aug. 2007 — Narrowing of selection to four sites, followed by environmental impact study expected to take one year
Fall 2008 — DHS expected to choose site
2015 — Earliest likely time for construction to be completed

— Lt. Gov. Mark Parkinson

fald said the facility's work would help reduce the threat of those diseases and the dangers they pose to America's food supply.

"When something happens to that food system," Wefald said, "whether it's Foot and Mouth Disease coming into the feedlots in southwestern Kansas or something that would be an attack on our wheat fields, you are talking about dramatic repercussions not only for Kansas, but the whole economy."

He said K-State has sponsored research in food safety and security for a decade and the NBAF would fit in here.

Wefald compared Kansas' efforts to compete with other states for the NBAF to that of David and Goliath.

However, he said, the rapid political mobilization in Kansas coupled with its history of research in the field and strong private sector assets give it a strong standing.

"There is no part of the country that brings as much to the table to this effort as we do, and that is why I think we have a shot at getting the Department of Homeland Security to pick Kansas," he said.

Some are surprised that there is no competition between Manhattan and Leavenworth, Ron Trewyn, vice provost for research, said. He said the two communities are working together to increase their overall odds at getting the NBAF.

"Leavenworth is supporting Manhattan, Manhattan is supporting Leavenworth," Trewyn said. "We want the site in Kansas, but we tied our capabilities at K-State and the BRI to both proposals."

The overall effort toward cooperation between all the sides will prove beneficial for Kansas, Board of Regents Chairman Nelson Galle said. He said the adversarial relationship between academics and political leaders in other areas doesn't exist here.

"When government and academic people and universities and the private sector work together, everything is possible," Galle said.

Parkinson said the cooperation and quick action of the legislature in just a matter of weeks is refreshing after seeing other issues take years to be resolved and wished it would happen more often.

"Maybe we need to get all those same people in the same room and say, 'Let's have that same track for deferred maintenance,'" Parkinson said.

The officials laughed.

"I'll second that, Governor," Galle said.

The Department of Homeland Security is considering 16 sites in 10 states other than Kansas

-California
-Georgia (two sites)
-Kentucky
-Maryland
-Mississippi (three sites)
-Missouri
-North Carolina
-Oklahoma
-Texas (four sites)
-Wisconsin

TO THE POINT Prevent, don't doubt global warming trends

Global warming is not a myth made up by a group of liberal environmentalists.

Several people have argued that global warming is just part of the world's natural warming and cooling progression, but numbers suggest otherwise. According to NASA, 2005 was the warmest year on record.

The heat increase is not just part of a natural trend. Temperatures and carbon emissions are at much higher levels than ever. This hike in temperatures began only recently because of the influence of human beings.

According to a report from the Environmental Protection Agency, the primary causes of increased carbon emissions and temperature are large economic growth, expanding industrial production and increased travel. All of these require an incredible amount of fossil fuels, heat the planet and melt ice caps.

Melting ice caps not only could drown coastal cities, but also could kill several ice-dwelling creatures like polar bears.

There is no doubt the Earth is heating because of human influence. There are things people – even college students – can do to lessen human intervention.

First, recycle everything you can, including plastic, aluminum, Styrofoam and paper. When you finish reading the Collegian, place it in a recycling bin. It saves trees and work for facilities employees.

Second, ride a bike or walk to class. Much of the pollution in the atmosphere comes from gas-guzzlers like Lincoln Navigators cruising the streets unnecessarily.

These are just a few suggestions for helping the environment. Though some negate global warming's existence, making the planet a little cleaner wouldn't hurt.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Jardine project to create housing for all budgets

There's something amazing happening at K-State.

Few know that the largest project in the state of Kansas is under construction on our campus. It costs $104 million and covers more space than a football field.

SPENCER

You're saying, "Surely I would have noticed something that big, Ryan," and you probably already have if you've been to Peters Recreation Complex in the past year.

The buildings I speak of are at the new Jardine Apartment complex. The first building in the new complex will officially open with a ribbon cutting Tuesday morning.

K-State's Department of Housing and Dining has worked on the project for almost 10 years, and it's turning wonderfully. The new apartments will provide students a chance to live on campus but in an environment other than the residence halls.

The biggest change the new apartments will provide is the greater inclusion of undergraduates into the complex.

Until now, the vast majority of Jardine residents were international and married students with families. Starting this semester, students that have formally lived in one of our traditional residence halls may also earn a space in Jardine.

This will provide a new level of on-campus housing for K-State to offer students in the future.

Universities across the country already offer or are preparing to offer apartment living options to students, and now K-State will join those ranks.

The foundation for the new apartment project focuses on four cornerstones – globalism, education, imagination and tradition. Residents of the Jardine complex chose those cornerstones, which have been incorporated into every phase of the redevelopment project, as well as plans for future development.

Jardine has always had a strong tradition of a large and proud international community. The goal for the staff will be ensuring Jardine holds on to its history of great diversity while at the same time incorporating the new influx of undergrads. It will be an exciting challenge, to say the least.

For now, we look to what the future holds for Jardine in the next year.

The different levels of staff and student leadership will need to change and adapt to varying conditions as groups of people come to live together in a tight-knit community.

Virtual transactions affect reality

More than two million online gamers in the United States alone play "World of Warcraft," a number massive enough that some analysts blame it for monopolizing player time and squeezing the rest of the PC gaming market. But "World of Warcraft" isn't just making millions of dollars very month – it literally is making money by creating its own currency.

GREG

Money just isn't what it used to be. Back in the day, everyone measured money with precious metals like gold or silver.

Later – but still back in the day – we switched to coins and bills that served as IOUs from the government, which stored the precious metals.

Several Bond villains later, the government phased out its stored precious metals while banks introduced alternatives like checks and credit cards.

Now, online payment services like PayPal reduce currency to a digital file handed from person to person. Between this and credit cards, we have shifted most of our money from heavy metal to electronic form.

Through all their fiduciary innovations, services like PayPal and your bank still operate in dollars. After all, creating a new currency is hard.

Despite this, several communities have slipped into making their own forms of currency. One such example is Second Life, a serious attempt at creating the virtual-reality promised during the mid 1990s.

The masses haven't yet descended on this anything-but-humble community. Judging from press attention, and my brief forays, the population is disproportionately journalists and the strange fetishists known as furries.

But Second Life has a successful side-industry of people who create things like clothing, furniture, and architecture within the virtual world. All are only usable within that network, yet people spend virtual currency on them.

One way to get the group's virtual currency is to exchange your real money for Second Life's version. Linden Labs, the company behind Second Life, operates a market where you can buy or sell "Linden dollars," much as traders do in "real life."

A similar but stealthier market arose with regard to "World of Warcraft" currency. While Blizzard (the designer of "World of Warcraft") tries to quash them, several Internet sites allow players to buy or sell "gold," the money of the game.

A common motivation in buying this "gold" is to make character-advancement easier. As the adage goes, "time is money." This saves time, so it certainly is worth some money.

In earlier games of this type, the sellers were players seeking to make back the money they had already spent on the game. Since then, globalization has become even more widespread, making it financially viable to pay workers to play the game for money.

"Sweatshops" exist in poorer areas of China where people are given fully outfitted characters and expected to earn virtual money. In this way, these virtual economies have entered the real-life debate over globalization.

This also has domestic implications. In October of last year, Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J., confirmed to Reuters that Congress's Joint Economic Committee was even studying the possibility of taxing these virtual transactions.

As Saxton said, "virtual economies represent an area where technology has outpaced the law."

If the pattern of history holds true, the 21st century will be defined by how the law tries to catch up.

GIVE A GOLD-DIGGER A BREAK THE TIMES OF LONDON

I didn't know Anna Nicole Smith, so I don't know why I should have felt saddened on hearing she had died last week at age 39. Her claim to fame was that in 1994, when she was 26, she married an 89-year-old billionaire, J. Howard Marshall.

He died 14 months later. She was initially awarded $468 million, which was reduced to $87 million after outraged protestations from Marshall's son. Eventually this was reduced to nothing at all; the case was still rumbling on at the time of her death.

I know we are not supposed to feel much admiration for 26-year-old bottle blondes who marry ancient millionaires, but I don't see what's so terribly wrong with it. If I'd been a dirt poor, child bride, chicken-shack waitress from the wrong side of the tracks, I could think of worse things to do with my time.

Smith was a dazzlingly pretty girl, working as a stripper by the time she met Marshall. He presumably died with a smile on his face and a spring in his step, and she got – or thought she was going to get – a big fat load of money. It seems a fair exchange.

DECODING THE DEBATE ON THE BLACKNESS OF OBAMA THE NEW YORK TIMES

Those of us who were born black in the years just after World War II had front-row seats for the collapse of American apartheid.

We started out confined to all-black communities and schools, but as segregation gave way, many of us were vaulted out of this sequestered world and into colleges, jobs and walks of life that had been closed to us. The rush of upward mobility produced an identity crisis, which led in turn to endless discussions about the meaning of blackness.

Back then, black Americans who came from successful, suburban and upwardly mobile families were regularly dismissed as white or inauthentic. The authentic black experience, it was said at the time, was limited to the hard-core, impoverished upbringing that black people often chose to brag about.

The arguments being raised about Sen. Barack Obama's blackness – or his lack of blackness – seem positively antique at a time when Americans are moving away from the view of ancestry as a central demographic fact and toward a view that dispenses with those traditional boundaries.

The claim that the candidate isn't really black because his mother is white carries little weight under either system. It makes no sense at all to the young Americans who checked more than one box when identifying themselves by race in the last census. They subscribe to a fluid notion of race and seem perfectly willing to let people describe themselves racially any way they choose.

KC POLICE DEPARTMENT NEEDS LOCAL CONTROL THE KANSAS CITY STAR

State control of Kansas City's Police Department has been an abject failure. Year after year, the city has among the worst violent crime rates in the entire nation. Too many people don't feel safe in their neighborhoods.

The current system is an anachronism from the 1930s. The board too often loosely oversees the department, which has slow response times and unacceptably low rates in solving crimes. These unelected board members are not accountable to local voters.

Overall, the people we elect to lead our city don't control – and aren't held responsible for – the most essential public safety service the city provides.

BRITISH TYCOON OFFERS $25-MILLION PRIZE TO FIGHT CLIMATE CHANGE

LONDON — British entrepreneur Richard Branson dangled a $25-million prize before the world's top scientists Friday seeking to spur research devising ways to suck greenhouse gases out of the air.

Former U.S. Vice President Al Gore lent his support to the challenge, which came a week after a landmark report by the world's leading climate scientists and government officials warned that global warming will continue, creating a far different planet in 100 years. "Man created the problem — therefore man should solve the problem," Branson said.

PORTUGAL DEBATES OVER WHETHER OR NOT TO EASE STRICT ABORTION LAW

LISBON, Portugal — Portugal is deciding in a national referendum Sunday whether or not to discard its strict abortion law, a battle that pits the Socialist government against conservative parties and the Catholic church.

The center-left Socialist government wants to grant women the right to opt for abortion during the first 10 weeks of pregnancy.

Portugal, where more than 90 percent of people say they are Catholic, has one of the most restrictive abortion laws in the European Union. The procedure is allowed only in cases of rape, fetal malformation or if a mother's health is in danger and only in the first 12 weeks of pregnancy.

In 23 other EU nations, abortion is permitted within much broader limits. Women can ask for abortions up to week 24 of pregnancy in Britain and up to week 12 in Germany, France and Italy.

6 DEAD, 6 INJURED, TRAPPED UNDERGROUND IN CANARY ISLANDS

MADRID, Spain — A group of scientists and nature lovers exploring tunnels in the Canary Islands became trapped underground and at least six of them died after apparently inhaling toxic gases, officials said Sunday.

The group of 30, among them scientists from a renowned astrophysics observatory, descended into the man-made tunnels Saturday. Several people appeared to have been struck unconscious by gases, said Jose Miguel Ruano, Tenerife regional government minister. Six people — five men and a woman — were pulled from the tunnel dead, and six others were taken to a hospital by helicopter, Ruano said.

Jose Andres Garcia, the island's emergency services director, said the group was about a mile underground in an area where gases may have seeped into the tunnels, robbing them of oxygen.

5 DEAD AS TROOPS FIRE INTO CROWD DURING SOMALIAN PEACE RALLY

KISMAYO, Somalia — A march that drew thousands in support of peacekeepers ended in violence Sunday when an explosion went off and government troops fired into the crowd in response. At least five people were killed.

Thousands had marched through Kismayo, 260 miles southwest of the capital, Mogadishu, to support a peacekeeping mission for Somalia.

"Somali people need the help of Africans," they chanted. "Somalia's stability needs to be restored."

It was not immediately clear what caused the explosion, which happened as Army Chief Gen. Abdi Mahdi was to address the rally.

GATES SAYS NO TO 2ND COLD WAR IN RESPONSE TO TOUGH TALK BY PUTIN

MUNICH, Germany — U.S. Secretary of Defense Robert Gates responded Sunday to Vladimir Putin's assault on U.S. foreign policy by saying one Cold War is enough and that he would go to Moscow to try to reduce tensions. Gates also sought more allied help in Afghanistan.

He delivered his first speech as defense secretary at a security conference in Germany and then flew to Pakistan to discuss fears of a renewed spring offensive by Taliban fighters in neighboring Afghanistan.

Gates' rebuke of the Russian president relied on humor and some pointed jabs.

"As an old Cold Warrior, one of yesterday's speeches almost filled me with nostalgia for a less complex time — almost," Gates said. Then, as the audience chuckled, he said he has accepted Putin's invitation to visit Russia.

"We all face many common problems and challenges that must be addressed in partnership with other countries, including Russia," Gates said. "One Cold War was quite enough."

Not every indulgence becomes an addiction

Editor,

I don't understand why Michael Leahy is to be commended. He gets paid to regurgitate statistics and explain why something that is bad for some must be bad for everyone. P.T. Barnum would be proud.

Without the anonymity of the Fourum to hide behind, I can't discuss my own porn-viewing habits, so let's call them "casual consumption."

Well, I have no body image issues, eating disorders, or self-hatred, and I don't objectify women.

When it comes to any vice, there are those who can indulge responsibly and those who can't.

I feel sorry for the latter, but I wish they'd stop harassing the former.

We also need to be careful when we use the word "addiction."

You evoke the tribulations a heroin junkie faces, but when was the last time you heard of someone throwing up because they were going through "porn withdrawals"?

Leahy talks of a more and more pornographic culture.

He seems to think our nation is becoming more hedonistic and decadent.

What's more confusing to me is he seems to think this is a bad thing.

I, for one, am shocked that a nation supposedly built on Roman and Greek classicism is so clearly lacking in Dionysian diversions.

I want to remedy this situation, but promise to do only what I can.

This weekend, during the Roman orgy, I'll drink an extra glass of vino and propose a toast to antagonistic sticks in the mud like Leahy. Here's hoping you lighten up.

Cheers.

Student columnist from 1920s discusses evolution, its effects on human responses

By F. Marshall Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Editor's note: The K-State Collegian published the following column on Dec. 3, 1929. This piece by Frank Marshall Davis is the third in a series published this month to honor Davis' memory.

When Davis came to K-State in 1924, he was one of only 26 black students enrolled. He wrote a weekly column called "A Diplomat in Black," in which he discussed politics, history and campus life with humor and candor.

We ask readers to enjoy this piece of history.

From New York City, recently an expedition started for Africa to search for the ancestors of human beings.

If found, it is not known what punishment the searchers plan to give them.

A second group is now exploring little-known parts of Asia in an attempt to find where civilization began. Another party will investigate and see what became of it.

You can believe Darwin's theory of survival of the fittest until you take a look at Congress.

The biggest trouble with evolution is that it seems to work both ways. Some woman is constantly making a monkey out of a man.

It might do the Fundamentalists a lot of good to believe in evolution. It would take an awful lot off the shoulders of Adam and Eve.

It does look kind of bad for all humans when a man can't find anything willing to take the responsibility of starting us off.

Man is probably superior to the other animals because of his kind heart. Look at what he does for the feeble-minded. He marries them.

I don't know what it has to do with evolution, but a good-looking chicken has softened many a bad egg.

Judging from appearances, it doesn't seem a bit far-fetched to believe that fish and some men are akin to each other.

In case there's a doubt in one's mind, there is always one good way to tell whether it's monkey or man. Place a bottle of Kansas fight-me-now likker before the subject. If it drinks it, it's a man.

If the animals understand, evolution might mean revolution. So maybe it isn't such a bad world after all.

Knostman honored at game

This is the season for love stories, so here's one more.

Dick Knostman loved basketball. You could say they were high school sweethearts.

Knostman played center at Wamego High School in Wamego, Kan., in the late 1940s. He still smiles when he talks about his high-school career, but it's a bittersweet smile. Knostman's Red Raiders never won a state championship.

"We finished second one year," Knostman said. "We were in the tournament, but we got beat at inopportune times the other years."

After high school, Knostman never considered going anywhere but K-State. His dad was a letter winner three decades earlier, so K-State was in Knostman's blood.

"I tell everyone we were the first father and son basketball players to letter here at K-State," Knostman said. "I really didn't have a chance to go anywhere else, but that was OK."

Knostman's K-State career began in 1950, the same year Ahearn Field House opened. K-State advanced to the national championship that season — still the only championship game appearance in K-State history. The Wildcats fell to Adolph Rupp and Kentucky, 68-58.

Knostman earned All-America honors the next two seasons. As a senior, he scored 42 points and grabbed 23 rebounds in a game against Oklahoma. He finished his K-State career averaging a double-double.

"In those days, I did go to school, and I did study some, but I really wanted to play basketball," Knostman said.

After he finished at K-State, Knostman was drafted by the Syracuse Nationals of the National Basketball League, who later became the Philadelphia 76ers. He played for owner Danny Biasone, a basketball pioneer who pushed for an innovation called the shot clock.

However, Knostman's pro career would last less than a season. Midway through his rookie year, Knostman was drafted once again.

This time, though, it had nothing to do with basketball.

"I felt like I was just turning the corner, getting some serious playing time, and then came the call from Uncle Sam," he said.

Knostman, an ROTC cadet at K-State, was called to perform his two-year stint of active duty and

Wildcats bounce back from ugly loss to Jayhawks

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Bob Huggins is changing the way people perceive K-State basketball, one game at a time.

Several times this season, opposing teams have left Bramlage Coliseum with a loss and a new respect for the Wildcats' physical style of play. After K-State (18-7, 7-3 Big 12 Conference) beat Colorado (6-14, 2-8) 78-59 Saturday at Bramlage, Buffalo coach Ricardo Patton admitted something was different about the trip to Manhattan.

"They play extremely physical," Patton said. "I guess that's the biggest difference. They played hard under the previous coach, but it wasn't as much body-to-body contact as it is now."

That physical defense forced Colorado freshman Xavier Silas to produce an unusual double-double. Silas scored 16 points and turned the ball over 10 times.

"It was just unforced — trying to get my teammates involved, trying to move faster than my feet were moving," Silas said. "It was just a lot of things put together."

Patton saw things differently. K-State forced 17 of Colorado's 23 turnovers in the second half.

"You just can't come out the second half and give the ball away like we did," Patton said. "Offensively, they took us out of anything we wanted to run. They were very physical with us. It was as physical a game as we've faced all season long."

Saturday's game allowed the Wildcats to bounce back from an ugly 97-70 loss to Kansas Wednesday, which ended a seven-game winning streak.

The embarrassing loss to the Jayhawks prompted Huggins to tweak his starting lineup. Senior Jermaine Maybank, who scored 26 points against Kansas, started for the first time in his Division I college basketball career.

Senior Lance Harris began the game on the bench for the first time since Jan. 6 against Texas A&M. He played only one minute of the second half of Wednesday's loss to the Jayhawks.

"(Coach Huggins) has challenged us a lot," Harris said. "He expects us to step up a little bit more than what we have been showing."

Senior Cartier Martin continued his streak of starting the game on the bench. In the last eight games, Martin has scored in double figures despite being left out of the starting lineup.

Huggins said the reason he prefers to keep his leading scorer on the bench for tipoff is because he only has two consistent scorers — Martin and junior David Hoskins.

"They set the tempo of how the game is being played," Huggins said. "I have to have one of those guys on the floor or we can't score."

Martin led the Wildcats with 25 points, and Hoskins finished with 13 points.

Silas' 16 points led the way for Colorado. Senior Dominique Coleman and sophomore Jermyl Jackson-Wilson had 14 and 11, respectively,

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

K-State's David Hoskins goes up for a shot against Colorado defenders Saturday night at Bramlage Coliseum. Hoskins scored 13 points in the Wildcats' 78-59 win against the Buffaloes.

Coleman dished out four of the Buffaloes' nine assists.

Colorado junior Richard Roby entered the game as the Buffaloes' leading scorer with 17.6 per game. However, the Wildcats held him to five points on 1-of-9 shooting.

The win gave the Wildcats seven Big 12 victories for the first time since the 1998-99 season with then coach Tom Asbury. K-State has not won more than seven games in conference play since the Big 12 was formed in 1996.

Martin passed Mitch Richmond on K-State's all-time leading scorer's list. With 1,340 points, he will need 24 points to go ahead of Chuckie Williams for sixth place on the list.

RUN | Sellers sets new school record in the High Jump

The K-State track and field team has had some great high jumpers throughout the years, like Kyle Lancaster and Percell Gaskins, but sophomore Scott Sellers has topped them all.

Sellers

Sellers entered the weekend tied with Lancaster and Gaskins for the school's high-jump record with a clearance of 7-5 1/4, but he broke it this weekend at the Iowa State Classic with a jump of 7-5 3/4.

"When I step back and think about it, it is quite amazing," Sellers said.

Sellers won the high jump and set the Lied Recreation Center record. It was his fourth-straight high-jump victory of the year and the fifth of his career.

"It was crazy," Sellers said. "It was so crowded, and I want to say I heard that there were 2,000 people there."

He wasn't the only winner of the weekend. Junior Morgan Bonds won the women's 800-meter run for the fourth time this year. She has not lost the event all year.

"I am running to get a faster time, but winning means I am becoming better at racing," Bonds said.

Bonds won the event with a time of 2:06.20. It beat Missouri's Trisa Nickoley by .34 seconds and was the second-fastest oversized track time in school history.

Other standouts of the meet were junior Marianne Schlachter in the triple jump and sophomore Loren Groves in the weight throw.

Schlachter placed third with a mark of 41-9 3/4. She entered the meet ranked seventh in the nation in the event and second in the Big 12 Conference with a distance of 43-1/2. That mark also provisionally qualifies her for the NCAA Indoor Championship.

Groves threw a career-best with a distance of 67-11 1/2. Her previous best was 67-10; 1/4 at the KSU Invitational. She placed second in the weight throw behind the world and American record-holder Brittany Riley of Southern Illinois.

The surprise of the weekend was senior Kaylene Wagner in the women's high jump. She failed to win after winning her previous five meets. She placed fifth with her lowest jump of the year at 5-9 1/4.

GLF | Golf team starts spring season in Houston

The K-State men's golf team begins its spring season today in Houston.

K-State, along with Arkansas and Norris

Lamar, will take part in the Lochinvar Challenge. The Wildcats face a challenge, as Lamar is the No. 9 team in the country, according to the latest Golfweek Ratings from Feb. 4.

Coach Tim Norris, in his 10th season as the men's golf coach, guides the Wildcats. Norris has led the Wildcats to four-straight NCAA Regional berths and five overall.

Junior Kyle Yonke led the team during the fall in stroke average at 74.53.

Freshman Mitchell Gregson finished the fall season with a stroke average of 75.00, while freshman Joe Ida finished with an average of 75.53.

The fourth Wildcat to play in all 5 events was sophomore Robert Streb. Streb finished with a stroke average of 75.60.

In the Wildcats' last outing they finished 10th in the Club Glove Intercollegiate tournament, which Lamar won.

The tournament will be the first time the Wildcats have played with three teams or less since defeating Oklahoma head-to-head in 2002.

GLF | Mickelson changes the conversation with Pebble win

PEBBLE BEACH, Calif. — Anyone worried that Phil Mickelson was emotionally scarred by that U.S. Open collapse can relax.

Mickelson finally got his season on track Sunday by closing with a 6-under 66 under surprising sunshine to tie the tournament record at the Pebble Beach National Pro-Am, and won for the 30th victory of his career.

He overcame a double bogey with a lost ball early in the round with three birdies in a four-hole stretch along the ocean, turning a tight race into another runaway. He matched the largest margin of victory at this tournament, winning by five shots over Kevin Sutherland.

It was the 11th time in 15 seasons Mickelson won on the West Coast Swing, and the timing couldn't have been better. He had started his season slowly, allowing the conversation to linger on his gaffe last summer at Winged Foot, when he chopped his way to a double bogey on the final hole to lose the U.S. Open.

K-State ends 4-game losing streak with road win over Tech

By Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Wildcats must be walking with a little air in their steps.

K-State (16-8, 4-7 Big 12 Conference) broke a four-game losing streak with a definitive 66-59 victory at Texas Tech Saturday, proving the Wildcats still are capable of strong play despite the absence of sophomore Marlies Gipson.

It was K-State's fourth-straight victory against the Lady Raiders.

Texas Tech (14-11, 5-6 Big 12), despite struggling offensively, was able to come within five when a jumper from freshman Raquel Christian brought the score to 62-57 with less than a minute left in the second half. However, that was the closest the Lady Raiders would get to taking the lead.

K-State connected on 5-of-11 free throw attempts in the last two minutes to secure the win.

Shalee Lehning led the Wildcats with 16 points and eight rebounds. The sophomore point guard put her versatile skills on display, scoring off of close-range jumpers as well as aggressive drives into the lane. Lehning also dished a game-high eight assists.

Freshman Ashley Sweat also contributed strong play for K-State, posting 16 points and eight rebounds. Senior Claire Coggins finished with 13 points.

The Wildcats came out strong in the first half, jumping to a quick 8-5 lead with 17:20 remaining. Texas Tech increased its offensive pressure, however, and a jumper from senior Alesha Robertson gave the Raiders a 14-10 lead with 12:51 to go in the first half.

K-State responded with a 15-2 run in the next nine minutes, which was aided by Texas Tech's 0-for-16 shooting from the field during that time. Coggins gave the Wildcats their biggest lead when she hit a left-handed layup off a fast break to make it 25-16.

Robertson provided a spark for the Raiders' offense toward the end of the half, but a quick four points from Lehning and Sweat in the final minute gave K-State the 31-22 half-time advantage.

Robertson led the Lady Raiders with 15 points and eight rebounds, 6-foot-6 senior Patrice Edwards added 11 and Christian finished with 10.

The Wildcats return home to face Colorado at 7 p.m. Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

Harvard's board names school's 1st female president

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Harvard University named historian Drey Gilpin Faust as its first female president on Sunday, ending a lengthy and secretive search to find a successor to Lawrence Summers and his tumultuous five-year tenure.

The seven-member Harvard Corporation elected Faust, a noted scholar of the American South and dean of Harvard's Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study, as the university's 28th president. The 30-member board of overseers ratified the selection.

Faust, 59, recognized the significance of her appointment.

"I hope that my own appointment can be one symbol of an opening of opportunities that would have been inconceivable even a generation ago," Faust said at a news conference on campus. She also added, "I'm not the woman president of Harvard — I'm the president of Harvard."

With Faust's appointment, half of the eight Ivy League schools will have a female president. Her selection is noteworthy given the uproar over Summers' comments that genetic differences between the sexes might help explain the dearth of women in top science jobs, comments which sparked debates about equality at Harvard and nationwide.

Faust oversaw the creation of two faculty task forces, formed in the aftermath of Summers' remarks, to examine gender diversity at Harvard. She has been dean of Radcliffe since 2001, two years after the former women's college was merged into the university as a research center with a mission to study gender issues.

"This is a great day, and a historic day, for Harvard," said James R. Houghton, chairman of the presidential search committee.

Some professors have quietly groused that — despite the growing centrality of scientific research to Harvard's budget — the 371-year-old university is appointing a fifth-consecutive president who is not a scientist. No scientist has had the top job since James Bryant Conant retired in 1953; its last four have come from the fields of classics, law, literature and economics.

Faust is the first Harvard president who did not receive an undergraduate or graduate degree from the university since Charles Chauncy, an alumnus of Cambridge University in England, who died in office in 1672. She attended Bryn Mawr College and the University of Pennsylvania, where she also was a professor of history.

Faust pivots from managing Radcliffe, a think-tank with 87 employees and a $17 million budget, to presiding over Harvard's 11 schools and colleges, 24,000 employees and a budget of $3 billion. The Harvard presidency is perhaps the most prestigious job in higher education, offering a pulpit where remarks resonate throughout academic circles and unparalleled resources, including a university endowment valued at nearly $30 billion.

"Faculty turned to her constantly as someone whose opinion is to be trusted," said Sheldon Hackney, a former president of the University of Pennsylvania and southern historian who worked closely with Faust. "She's very clear, well-organized. She has a sense of humor, but she's very even-keeled. You come to trust in her because she's so solid."

In Faust, Harvard not only has its first female leader, but a president who has candidly discussed her feminist ideals in a memoir, "Shapers of Southern History: Autobiographical Reflections."

Born Catherine Gilpin in the Jim Crow era, to a privileged family in Virginia's Shenandoah Valley, Faust wrote that a conversation at age 9 with the family's black handyman and driver inspired her to send a letter to President Eisenhower pleading for desegregation.

She then began to question the rigid Southern conventions where girls wore "scratchy or gaudy dresses" and white children addressed black adults by their first names.

"I was the rebel who did not just march for civil rights and against the Vietnam War but who fought endlessly with my mother, refusing to accept her insistence that 'this is a man's world, sweetie, and the sooner you learn that, the better off you'll be,'" she writes.

Faust joins an exclusive roster of former Harvard presidents that have included colonial clergymen, Bay State patriots and a cabinet secretary.

While the presidential search was marked by disciplined secrecy — committee members met behind closed doors in a Georgian mansion and were quietly ushered away in idling Lincoln Town Cars — it also revealed an embarrassing trend — several top-tier candidates said they weren't interested.

Event in McCain Auditorium showcases Chinese culture

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State and Manhattan's Chinese community displayed the various aspects of its culture Sunday at McCain Auditorium.

The Chinese New Year Gala took place from 3 to 5 p.m. Sunday and featured several different performances to celebrate the new year.

Several singers performed native Chinese songs many of which featured dancers in the background.

After the opening number, K-State students sang a series of tunes, including Ying Zhou, senior in hotel and restaurant management, who performed the solo, "Let Us Do It Together."

Dan Liu, graduate student in biochemistry, and Kebing Yu, graduate student in mechanical engineering, then performed a duet. The crowd cheered when the songs were finished.

Following the singers, performers presented a group dance and a Chinese flute solo.

The event also featured Kung Fu, which means "hard work" in Chinese, and was represented through a variety of different performances and showcases.

Many community patrons attended the event. The crowd included students and residents of all ages and different nationalities, many of whom said they were excited to see the show.

Adam Bellerive, a Manhattan resident whose girlfriend was in several of the dances, said he was excited about the event.

"I have never been to one of these things before, and I think that it is going to be a good show," Bellerive said.

Several students also volunteered at the event. Robert Hinderliter, senior in English, was an usher for the event.

"I didn't know much about the event, and I am not sure what to expect," Hinderliter said.

The Chinese New Year, also known as the Chinese Spring Festival, is a time of celebration for Chinese families and friends and has an underlying message of peace and happiness, according to the Encarta Web site.

This will be the year of the boar, which begins Sunday.

The festival of lanterns, a celebration with dancing, signing and lantern shows, will mark the festival's end.

Energy proposal to boost economy

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Bush asked Congress to help solve one of the great challenges facing our generation by approving proposals he said will cut U.S. gasoline consumption by up to 20 percent during a 10-year period.

"Every member of Congress who cares about strengthening our economy, protecting our national security and confronting climate change should support the energy initiatives I have set out," Bush said Saturday in his weekly radio address. "We can leave behind a cleaner and better world for our children and grandchildren."

Bush's energy proposals, made in his State of the Union address last month, include ramping up the production of alternative fuels such as ethanol made from new, non-corn feedstocks. The president wants to require the use of 35 billion gallons a year of ethanol and other alternative fuels, such as soybean-based biodiesel, by 2017, a five-fold increase over current requirements. The ethanol would be in gasoline blends of 10 to 85 percent.

The call for sharp increases in ethanol use will get bipartisan support in Congress, but production of ethanol from corn is expected to fall far short of meeting such an increase. Bush envisions a significant speed-up of research into production of "cellulosic" ethanol made from wood chips, switchgrass and other feedstocks.

The other key element of his plan is changing the way fuel-economy standards are set for passenger cars.

Bush wants Congress to give his administration the power to set the standards for cars, using a system it says cuts emissions while preserving choices and safety for consumers. Bush opposes any legislation simply setting a number for higher fuel-economy standards.

The Democratic-controlled Congress has not entirely dismissed his energy ideas. Still, Bush unsuccessfully asked for the fuel-economy authority before. And some environmentalists say Bush's goals fall far short of what is needed.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., said Bush is ignoring the problem of global warming by not embracing some mandatory emission reductions. The president has made it clear he has no plans to shift away from a largely voluntary program to address climate change, continuing to oppose mandatory reductions of so-called greenhouse gases.

Kansas professor receives Grammy nomination

By Bethany Bunch
UNIVERSITY DAILY KANSAN

LAWRENCE - University of Kansas professor Robert Koenig thanked the Academy for his Grammy nomination.

Koenig's recording of "Viola Transcriptions" competed with four other nominees in the Best Instrumental Soloist Performance category at the Grammy Awards on Sunday in Los Angeles.

Koenig, a pianist, recorded the release with acclaimed violinist Roberto Diaz.

Koenig learned of his nomination in early December, but said it's still hard to believe.

"For the first few weeks after the announcements, I continued to go back to the grammy.com Web site, just to make sure that I really wasn't dreaming it all," he said.

Koenig and Diaz made the recording in Toronto in 2004 and released it in summer 2006 on a label called Naxos. The label submitted the recording to the Recording Academy, which chose it from more than 150 submissions.

Koenig said he was thrilled for the recognition, although a Grammy nomination was never a goal of his.

"My only goals as a pianist and accompanist have always been to prepare to the highest level and to present the best possible musical performance that I can," Koenig said. "To receive this nomination for this CD is like icing on the cake."

Larry Mallett, chairman of the Department of Music and Dance, came to KU the same year as Koenig in 2001. Mallett said Koenig is the perfect example of an outstanding faculty member.

"Bob is a wonderful colleague and outstanding teacher," Mallett said. "I knew when he got here that he was world-class."

Before coming to KU seven years ago, Koenig was a staff pianist at the Juilliard School and the Curtis Institute of Music.

Koenig performs regularly throughout the world. Recent engagements include performances at Carnegie Hall in New York, Suntory Hall in Tokyo and the Louvre Museum in Paris.

He also has appeared on ABC's "Good Morning America" and CBS' "This Morning."

"It's been an exciting time and has been a tremendous honor to get this nomination," Koenig said.

Koenig did not come away a winner at the awards ceremony. The Grammy in his category went to Maurizio Pollini's performance of Chopin's "Nocturnes."

More universities use podcasts

By Jake Melville
U-WIRE

WASHINGTON - In the next couple of weeks, college students across the country will begin studying for midterms. Thanks to technology, some will be able to listen to their lectures again.

Podcasting - or the technology that makes it easier to download audio files as they are released - has taken hold in the lecture halls of our nation's universities.

Richard Shingles is a professor of biology and in charge of the podcasting program at Johns Hopkins University, in Baltimore, Md. This is the third semester he has recorded his General Biology course and posted it online for students.

The program at Johns Hopkins began last spring with Shingles's class. Now, eight courses, mostly large lectures, are available for students to download.

"It's an ancillary to the class," as opposed to a replacement, Shingles said.

"Students can use (it) to review lecture material or to catch up on material that they may have missed."

About 18-20 percent of students take advantage of this technology around exam time, Shingles said.

Best of all, he said, the nature of the product means "students can review lecture material on their own time and when it is most convenient to them."

This reduces the need (for) discussion sections, when students would otherwise review lecture materials.

Various colleges around the country give professors the opportunity to use the technology, including Purdue University and the University of California at Berkeley.

UC Berkeley boasts one of the largest and most popular coursecasting programs available to the general public.

Berkeley's iTunes U site hosts 77 different courses in fields as diverse as philosophy, psychology, international studies and chemistry.

Last semester alone, 1,682,520 files were downloaded, which include those in the month of December.

"As a study tool, this is very beneficial," said Richard Bloom, the Course Webcast Administrator at Berkeley. "Being able to get the lectures and go over something you missed in class or maybe didn't understand can be a great help."

Because of its distribution on iTunes, Berkeley's lectures reach a wider audience than its students.

"We get e-mails from people all over the world thanking us for the service and saying how wonderful it is to have a subject that they've always been interested in but were never able to pursue," Bloom said.

Berkeley's program began in the spring of 2006 with more 30 courses available for download online, either through iTunes U or through the school's Web site.

Southern California researchers conduct study on Latino link to diabetes

By Arin Mikailian
DAILY TROJAN

LOS ANGELES - Latinos could be more likely to get type 2 diabetes than other ethnicity, according to a study on Latino youth conducted by Veronica Atkins, the National Institute of Health and the National Cancer Institute.

Atkins, wife of late diet guru Robert Atkins, funded the launch of the Veronica Atkins Lifestyles Intervention Lab, designed to treat obesity and metabolic diseases, at the University of Southern California's Health Science Campus.

The facility opened in January and features exercise equipment, diagnostic facilities and a stocked kitchen.

The lab's first study involved the Strength and Nutrition Outcome for Latino Adolescents.

"The Latino population seems to be more overweight, insulin-resistant and likely to get type 2 diabetes than any other ethnic group," said Dr. Jaimie Davis, a research associate and nutritionist for SANO-LA.

In 2004, Veronica Atkins funded Dr. Michael Goran's pilot study, which tested a nutritional diet on a group of young Latino adolescent males to determine if a healthier eating lifestyle can lower the risk of developing type 2 diabetes.

According to the report, Goran found the treatment to improve insulin sensitivity, which reduces the risk of attaining type 2 diabetes.

Davis said the results from Goran's study impressed Atkins and encouraged her to fund the creation of the lab for additional studies.

The SANO-LA builds upon the foundation of Goran's study by separately testing numerous waves of 30 adolescent Latino males and females by subjecting them to the same nutritional diet, Davis said.

The study includes a combination group, which blends the nutritional treatment with a strength-training routine involving weights.

A separate control group also is included, which receives no treatment.

"We want to see which one is going to be most effective," Davis said. "Our hypothesis is that the group that exercised will be the ones that lose the most weight and improve the most metabolically."

For 16 weeks, the nutritional group meets once per week at the lab while the combination group meets twice. During the 90-minute nutritional lessons, Davis said the teens are taught how to eat healthier to improve their metabolic health by getting them involved through games and case scenarios.

"Our main goal is to decrease added sugar and increase dietary fiber," Davis said. "We work with them on ways to do that."

Dr. Louise Kelly, a research associate for SANO-LA, said another feature of the nutritional lesson is that the teens also are taught how to cook while maintaining a "culturally appropriate diet."

"We don't want the kids to start eating caviar," she said. "It's traditional Hispanic food that's gone back to the basics, but with higher fiber and lower sugar."

Davis said the teens could still enjoy a traditional quesadilla, but rather than using a flour tortilla they substitute it with a whole-wheat tortilla.

As the day winds down for the nutritional group, it is only the halfway point for the combination group.

Davis said the strength-training arm of the study has multiple phases that increase the weight of the dumbbells and number of repetitions. She also believes strength training could prove just as effective at increasing metabolic health as relying on jogging or running.

"The reason why weight training is so beneficial for this population is because we have kids that are 100, 150 pounds overweight," she said. "Asking them to run a mile is not really the most efficient way; they can't do it. It's difficult for them. (With) weight training these kids see results, and they see them immediately."

Davis said she plans on performing the same study on black youths in May.

After each wave is finished, each participant is tested once a month on aspects ranging from body mass index to insulin sensitivity for a full year following the program.

Because of the time and detail dedicated to the study, Davis said she does not anticipate the results of the study to be finalized until 2010.

In the meantime, both Davis and Kelly look ahead to see how far the study can be applied in the outside world.

"We'd actually like to tap into Caucasian kids and the Asian population," Davis said. "These are feasibility studies to see what type of intervention is going to work then we can go disseminate it into communities."

Kelly said she's working with the owner of a dumbbell store to provide the teens with equipment.

"We want them not just to do the program, but to learn from it and continue on," she said. "(So) if they want to go to a gym, they can walk in and know what to do."

Former K-State, NBA player's jersey retired in ceremony

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

During his playing days, Rolando Blackman earned all of his accolades at Ahearn Field House, where he became known as arguably the greatest player in K-State basketball history.

From 1977-81, Blackman scored 1,844 points — the second most all-time — and received nearly every honor imaginable.

Three times the Big 8 Conference named him Defensive Player of the Year, twice he led the Wildcats to the NCAA Tournament, and in 1980 he was named Big 8 Player of the Year.

And that's just for starters. Blackman graced the cover of Sports Illustrated in 1981 after hitting the game-winning jump shot against Oregon State in the second round of the NCAA Tournament.

Not long after that, the Dallas Mavericks drafted him ninth overall. Blackman now works with the Mavericks as the team's director of basketball development.

His career in Dallas was a productive one, too. He was a four-time NBA all-star, retired as the team's all-time leading scorer with 16,643 points and his Mavericks jersey — No. 22 — was retired on March 11, 2000.

After a halftime ceremony Saturday night at Bramlage Coliseum in which 11,758 fans gave him a 29-second standing ovation, Blackman has another jersey in another building hanging from the rafters.

"It's hugely special," Blackman said. "Any time you look up there and you see No. 25, you get a chance to ask about this person. You really get other people to tell the stories about why and how that happened."

One of the main reasons for his success, Blackman said, was the influence former coach Jack Hartman. A native of Brooklyn, N.Y., Blackman didn't know what to expect when he decided to come to K-State in 1977.

"I wasn't exactly the greatest, most confident guy coming to school here," Blackman said. "I came here with open eyes, wonderment, looking around to see how to be led. I got great treatment from Jack Hartman, his treatment, his discipline."

As Blackman walked off the floor of Bramlage Saturday night, his jersey hanging overhead, the K-State fans in attendance treated him well, too.

In many ways, it was a symbolic night for Wildcat basketball.

The structure of K-State's program was never stronger than when Blackman captained a team that wore two-tone purple uniforms and played toe-to-toe with in-state rival Kansas.

In Blackman's four seasons, the Wildcats finished 6-6 against the Jayhawks.

With coach Bob Huggins

Rolando Blackman, the second-leading all-time scorer in K-State basketball history, points to his jersey Saturday night as a part of a jersey retirement ceremony at Bramlage Coliseum. Blackman was a four-year letterman at K-State from 1977-81 and also received All-America honors.

reviving the program and helping lead his team to an 18-7 start, Blackman can't help but smile.

It's been more than a decade since the Wildcats last appeared in the NCAA Tournament, and since the Big 12 Conference's inception in 1996, the Wildcats haven't finished better than seventh.

"You open that paper and see K-State up the ladder in third place in the conference — it's a good feeling," Blackman said. "It's tough to have your school at the bottom of the rung all the time."

With Huggins at the helm and a wealth of highly regarded players, Blackman said he believes the Wildcats finally have the right match.

"You've got the double combination now," Blackman said. "You've got a very good coach and you've got very good athletes to coach. You've got the duality of what it takes to win."

From the heart

Create a homemade valentine for your significant other

■ Swift sweet

Tasty treats don't have to take all day. Try a new recipe and give it to the one you love.

Peanut Butter Valentine's Kiss Bars

Ingredients:
1/2 c. creamy peanut butter
1/4 c. butter or margarine
1 c. light brown sugar, packed
2 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
2/3 c. unsifted all-purpose flour
1 c. chopped salted peanuts (optional)
16 chocolate kisses, unwrapped

Preparation:

Cream peanut butter, butter and brown sugar in mixer bowl until fluffy. Add eggs and vanilla. Beat well.

Blend in flour, stir in 3/4 cup chopped peanuts. Spread evenly in greased 9x9x2-inch square pan.

Sprinkle with remaining peanuts. Bake at 350 degrees for 25 to 30 minutes or until lightly browned.

Remove from oven. Immediately press chocolate kisses in top allowing space for cutting the bars into squares. Cool completely. Remove from pan.

— Recipe from www.theholidayspot.com.

■ Quick cards

A valentine card can be easy to make and lovely to give. All it takes is a little time and some creativity. Here are a few ways to create a card to warm hearts and show your loved one you care.

■ Ribbon card

Supplies:
Cardstock (white or colored)
Black marker or pen
Glue or glue gun
Ribbon (various colors)

Take a piece of cardstock and fold in half. Cut a piece of ribbon the length of the card and glue onto the edge of the card's fold. Cut another piece of ribbon, and tie into a bow. Glue ribbon onto card. Write a message on the front.

■ Thumbprint card

Supplies:
Cardstock (white or colored)
Black marker or pen
Red stamp pad

Take a piece of cardstock and fold in half. Press thumb onto the red stamp pad, and create a heart with two thumb prints. Smaller hearts can be made with using the pinky. Outline hearts with a black marker, and write a note on the front.

■ Delightful dates

Going out doesn't have to cost you the bank. Here are a few ideas to make your Valentine's Day memorable without taking a toll on your wallet.

■ Playing around.

Go to a park or playground and remember what it's like to be young again. Play tag, swing and slide. Pack peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches or bring some Lunchables for when you start to hear your stomach rumble.

■ Shakespeare in the park.

Grab a book of Shakespeare's sonnets or a collection of romantic poetry and sit in the rose garden at Manhattan City Park. A bottle of wine and a picnic dinner would be a perfect plan for a pair of star-crossed lovers.

■ Wandering in the wilderness.

Visit the Sunset Zoological Park to see the animals, or hike to the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area to enjoy miles of nature.

■ Budding artists.

Even if you don't know who Monet is, you still can create a piece of art. Purchase finger paints or watercolors and make a splash of color.

■ Movie marathon.

Run to the video store and rent a handful of chick flicks, action films or a trilogy of favorites. Pop some microwave popcorn, grab a couple of sodas and enjoy the comfort of the movie theater in your living room.
